Stroke: Ticlopidine Better Than Aspirin?

A stroke is the result of inadequate blood flow to the brain. Major causes of a stroke include partial or complete blockage of blood vessels in the brain or a burst and leaking blood vessel. A stroke can leave its victim with permanent or temporary memory loss and difficulty speaking, difficulty walking, blurred vision, and dizziness.

Treatment of stroke begins with immediate hospitalization and a stabilizing of the blood pressure. Medications may be administered to control seizures and reduce swelling in the brain. Blood thinner medicines may be given to limit the progress of the stroke or to prevent the occurrence of new strokes.

Stroke prevention involves controlling high blood pressure and other risk factors such as smoking and high blood cholesterol. Oral medicines used to prevent strokes include aspirin and ticlopidine (Ticlid). Studies have shown that ticlopidine is slightly more effective in preventing stroke than is aspirin. However, the American Heart Association still recommends aspirin for stroke prevention—primarily because it costs considerably less ($10 to $20 per year versus $1,000 for ticlopidine). Other advantages of aspirin over ticlopidine is that aspirin is given only once a day and periodic blood tests are not required.

Off the Wall

By Marilyn Robinson

The freedom to live as we choose was celebrated over Memorial Day weekend. Decorated cemeteries and parades honored both the living and dead who fought for our country.

The long weekend also provided some R and R time. In my case it meant ride, rough it and research with the Over the Hill gang. About 10 steadfast riders ranging in age from a hardy 17 month old bouncing boy to a galloping grandmother, without better sense, explored the lush forest near Spring Creek.

Abundant deer, elk, wildflowers and a park-like forest provided the ideal setting. A curious coyote pup kept watch near its den to observe the intrusion of four-footed forest stalkers.

With the freeway and a train whistling in the distance on one side and the rushing water of the Grande Ronde River for a distant permiter in the opposite direction, no one could get permanently lost. It's just that our campsite sometimes seemed displaced. Rolling forested slopes and meadows began to all look alike. But we knew we were getting close to camp when we located our hanging tree landmark, which was used as a threat to our fearless leaders.

Sometimes it seemed as though camp moved of its own accord, but a friend and I knew it wasn't that easy. We weren't in the same league with others who had campers or a motorhome. Ferrules became as elusive as ferrets while trying to set up a tent. Like a spaceship, our domed bubble appeared ready for take off at times. The outside atmosphere didn't become as blustery as from "night time inhaling" (women don't snore) and explosions resulting from steak dinner over-indulgences.

One threesome in our riding group became known as Lewis, Clark and Sacajawea. Dressed in rain gear, two "heap big" brave scouts went looking for those three riders who had left camp without their coats. We did find their horse tracks but became thoroughly confused when their circling horse tracks did a complete about-face. Three hours later those soggy, wet souls limped into camp after reversing on a road that had led them almost to the freeway.

Trail riding rules suggest that accurate maps of an area can be useful. It's impossible to make sense of how the Forest Service numbers faint roads. It was also weird to see so many bird houses nailed on trees. Like the natives I guess that birds too must adapt to the white man's idea of living standards. Had we known this was the norm we could have carried bird seed or bread crumbs which could have also been used to lead us back to camp.

Brush poppers are supposed to ride well-mannered horses in good physical condition. But what's a trail ride without a few enlivening rodeo performances. How better to school a horse or test its athletic ability when it uncorks on rocky, steep ground. Riding skill also improves rapidly when one looks at such bone-crushing landing sites.

Then there are the night-time equine ground stompers and neighbors. They found their tie lines being moved farther into the wood away from campers trying to catch a few winks. It always amazes me how much energy a horse has left after a long day of packing a rider and all the gear.

Will I do it over again? Definitely. But it does make one appreciate a hot bath, running water and the conveniences of home.

Not All Synthetics Are Created Equal

There are many synthetic motor oils joining the market today. Of these, only AMSOIL puts more than two decades of experience into every bottle. AMSOIL was the first company in the world to manufacture an API-rated 100% synthetic motor oil. That was in 1972.

Today, AMSOIL Synthetic Motor Oils maintain their advantage. They exceed all major engine manufacturer's requirements, including GM-4718M, the requirement for Chevrolet Corvettes manufactured since 1991. The GM-4718M requirement is so strict that petroleum oils can't pass. Many synthetics can't pass either. But AMSOIL Synthetic Oils do! AMSOIL is also the only company to offer an extended drain interval with full warranty on its synthetic motor oils. AMSOIL recommends a 25,000-mile or one-year drain interval. Only AMSOIL puts this type of quality into their synthetic motor oils.

All synthetic motor oils are not created equal.
