Medicines for Enlarged Prostate

Benign (non-cancerous) prostatic hypertrophy (BPH) is an enlargement of the prostate gland that occurs with age. The enlargement obstructs the flow of urine out of the bladder. BPH is experienced by about 25 percent of men by the time they reach age 55. By age 75 some men may have as much as a 50 percent reduction in their urine stream flow force.

Symptoms of BPH include hesitancy in starting to urinate, difficulty in maintaining a forceful stream, dribbling after urination, and burning. The size of the prostate does not seem to relate to the severity of symptoms.

Until recently the most common treatment for BPH was a surgical procedure referred to as transurethral resection. A thin tube is passed through the penis to the prostate. An electric cutting loop on the tip of the tube is used to cut away prostate tissue. Some men do not need surgery. Two prescription medicines are now being used to treat BPH. Finasteride is a hormone-type medicine which stops the growth of prostate tissue by interfering with the conversion of testosterone to a substance that stimulates prostate cell growth. Terazosin relaxes the smooth muscles in the neck of the urinary bladder. This relaxation allows urine to flow more easily.
