Chamber Chatter

By Claudia Hughes, Chamber Manager

Have you heard the term "social capital"? This seems to be the new buzz word for communities and cities. According to Robert Putnam, author of two books, various articles, and keynote speaker at the past Rural Futures Forum Conference, it is imperative that communities have "social capital". Without it, their entire economic future is at stake. So what is this thing that healthy towns need? We've got it. It is simply social organizations that facilitate coordination, trust, and cooperation for mutual benefit. It's civic engagement in public affairs, it's people working together toward like goals...the pool, the RV park, the ag museum, the rodeo grounds, churches, chamber of commerce etc. It's the ranchers that share work loads, it's Main street businesses promoting each other, it's the parents club, and the list goes on and on.

The danger lies in the fact that many communities who once had this have seen a 50 percent decline, and the results have been disastrous. More women are working, out of necessity, it's easier to write a check and be physically invisible, socialability has declined, it's simpler to say "no" and watch your favorite T.V. show. Consequently trust declines, neighbors know each other less, and the overall health of a community is at stake. Putnam's point was that we all need to be physically engaged in our communities, as not only is it good for the community, it is good for our individual health. So, take heed. Are we slacking off or are we still on a roll? I think we're on a roll and that roll will continue if we build people connections and bring in new blood with new ideas and leadership.

Large cities are creating villages and houses with porches to try to create lost social capital. "Hats off to Heppner" if you use it, you don't lose it.

Thought for the week: "One good thing about putting your foot in your mouth, at least you don't step on anyone's toes".
