

Mushroom permits now available

Mushroom permits are now available for the 1995 mushroom season, announced Phil Kline, acting forest supervisor for the Umatilla National Forest. Persons wishing to harvest incidental amounts of mushrooms will not be required to obtain a free use permit this year.

According to Kline, "If you plan to harvest an incidental amount of mushrooms for your personal use, you will not need a permit. Commercial permits will only be required if you plan to sell, harvest, possess or transport more than one gallon of mushrooms in Oregon or three gallons in Washington." Our incidental amounts were defined to be consistent with state laws.

Persons wishing to obtain a commercial permit may do so at any administrative site on the Malheur, Umatilla or Wallowa-Whitman National Forests.

Prices for the permits are $2 per consecutive day ($10 minimum permit) or $50 annually. For more specific information about the mushroom permit, contact the Heppner Ranger District 676-9187.

Off the Wall

By Marilyn Robinson

The Heppner Garden Club is busy planning to host a day-long meeting for members of 10 clubs in District 10 on April 29. A meeting of such industrious minds will undoubtedly reveal many ways in which garden clubs help in the beautification of homes and communities.

What can this one person do when a severe case of spring fever is thwarted because a person's 'want to do' is limited by one's 'can do'? Weeds and grass grow overnight. In spite of all the modern implements now used in gardening, much yard work still requires hand power.

Surrounded by grass-mowing cows, newborn calves frolic with abundant energy. Green grass is a welcome change after a long spell of dry hay. And likewise I savor the rewards of fresh produce from a small garden.

But this year I plan to be more selective in planting. Zucchini are a no-no as they produce faster than they can be picked and never know when to quit. Providing my small garden spot gets tilled, it may grow staples such as lettuce, carrots and beans. But there's a small matter of getting the top dressing turned under.

I asked to have some barnyard fertilizer tractor-transported to the garden spot. I hoped for some decomposed material, but what I got came straight from the factory accompanied by a great deal of straw. Talk about a power-based composition. But I don't plan on growing giant pumpkins or squash since they have vines that reach out like the tentacles on a huge octopus.

Formal landscaping requires intense planning. But I heed a different approach such as plant now and move later. Other gardening methods seem to lead to planting small trees close enough together so that as they grow they can shake limbs with neighbors. Short plants are often hidden from view when planted behind taller ones. Letting strawberry plants grow an abundance of runners leads to a game of sorts as to where to put down one's feet.

Perhaps all gardening should be confined to elevated beds and planters to ease back stress. However acquiring that extra soil comes with another back-breaking chore. I continue to plant enough diversity to share with the wildlife. One exception is when deer chose to denude small trees and shrubs in the fall, even though they seem to want to help with fertilizing the ground.

Transforming winter's bleak landscape into a mecca of blooms seems to be the hidden agenda of gardeners. Our town benefits from the many gaily blooming flowers in planters along Main Street provided by the Garden Club. At this time of year it's a treat to drive by the host of yellow daffodils that are blossoming on Eleanor Gonty's property amid terraces. Blooming forsythia bushes, tulips and other dashes of color about town all herald the arrival of spring.

4-H ambassadors selected

Kelsie Evans and Mandi Gutierrez, both students at Heppner High School and Alejandra Torres, Boardman, were among 90 Oregon 4-H members selected for the 1995 4-H Ambassador program.

The new ambassadors, including a group of high school sophomores selected at the county level, will learn more about their responsibilities to help represent and promote the 4-H program at the 4-H Ambassador Weekend June 23-24 at Linfield College, according to Duane Johnson, OSU Extension 4-H youth development specialist.

The ambassadors were chosen on the basis of their 4-H resume, which includes a summary of their 4-H work as well as community and school activities. Some of the ambassadors will be interviewed for trips to the 1995 National 4-H Youth Congress in Memphis later this year.

The weekend, sponsored by the Oregon Farm Credit System and Capital Press newspaper, will include classes on citizenship as well as how to represent 4-H, Johnson said.

Evans was selected to be a 4-H Ambassador in the traditional project area. She has participated in sheep and horse projects. To be selected as an Oregon Ambassador 4-H'ers have to show that they have excelled in leadership and citizenship as well as in their project area.

"Kelsie was able to show everything she has participated in because she always has kept excellent records," said Bill Broderick, extension agent. "Any young 4-H'ers out there who want to be an Oregon 4-H Ambassador should take note and keep their record up to date."

The Oregon Ambassador program was changed last year with two new components added. Every county has the opportunity to select a sophomore to attend ambassador weekend and be trained as an ambassador. They then return to the county to work as an ambassador for the county. This year Mandi Gutierrez was selected to be Morrow County's sophomore ambassador.

She has been active in sheep, horse, clothing and style review. She has been a junior leader and helped in many ways with the 4-H program, says Broderick.

The second component was to select youth from school enrichment and special programs. This group includes all the youth who are not in traditional 4-H clubs, but who are served by Extension youth development programs. Alejandra Torres was selected for her involvement with the Hispanic Youth Leadership Conference (HYLC). She is the vice chair of the HYLC advisory committee. She made two presentations to about 320 participants. Torres is president of the Culture Club at Riverside High School. She has been active in planning and organizing the Boardman Cinco de Mayo celebration.

"At a time when we hear so many negative things about youth, it is great to be able to share the accomplishments of these three terrific young ladies," said Broderick. "If you know these young ladies, I encourage you to compliment them on their great accomplishments."
