National Grange Week will

"Since colonial times, Americans have considered theirs an agricultural nation," said a grange spokesperson. "The first census in 1790 showed 90 percent of the population living in rural areas. At the time of the Civil War, this had dropped to 80 percent. Today, the farmer is still an important factor in our economy even though the number of farms has dropped considerably.

"Oliver Hudson Kelley (1826-1913) is credited with establishing the Grange," the spokesperson continued. 'Even though he had no practical experience in farming, he shared the belief of others that agriculture was a noble career and that without the farmers, America's economy and moral fiber would collapse.

"In the 1850s, Kelley organized the Benton County Agricultural Society to share information about practices and farming implements. The official organization meeting was held December 4, 1867. Since that time, the Grange has flourished, becoming one of the largest organizations in the world."

The spokesperson also said the purpose of the grange is to improve the life of rural Americans by helping to secure such things as research to improve farming, rural electricity, rural mail delivery, direct election of senators, the initiative petition process, and the Sherman Anti-Trust Act. Today, members still emphasize the importance of being knowledgeable about legislation, agricultural practices and topics that affect the community.

Anyone who is interested is invited to join the organization.
