The Oregon Cattlemen's Association (OCA) have announced that they have selected Rod Dowse, of Redmond, as their new executive vice president.

"There were many highly qualified and excellent applicants with diverse skills and different areas of expertise that applied for the job. Rod was selected because of his knowledge, people skills and enthusiasm for the future of the cattle industry. He's young, bright and will bring a high level of excitement to the Oregon Cattlemen's Association," said Sharon Beck, chairman of the search committee.

Dowse, a native Oregonian, has an agribusiness management degree from Oregon State University. His extensive background in the cattle industry includes, most recently, managing a progressive purebred cattle ranch in Sequim, Washington, where he focused on marketing and customer service. He has also judged many cattle shows throughout the Pacific Northwest and Canada.

"He's one of us and has dynamic leadership skills," commented Fred Otley, president of the OCA. "It's nice to have an executive who possesses both a solid understanding of the industry and organizational abilities."

"These are both exciting and challenging times for our industry with issues ranging from deflated cattle prices to property rights. I am proud to serve this organization," stated Dowse.

The OCA is a membership-driven organization representing the cattle industry statewide. For more information about the OCA or its projects, call (503) 229-6830.
