Upon reaching grandparent status, one ought to have a handle on most things besides 'fessing up to one's limitations. Things like flapping one's arms, babysitting, making apple pies and chasing cows keep these bones busy and sometimes make sense, yet it's the mentality behind some things happening in this country that I fail to understand.

Oregon's extensive ballot measures and this election ballyhoo are enough to fracture a so-called "non-stressful" rural life. But it seems to me that what is lacking from both the public and the media is moral outrage. Perhaps this is an outdated emotion due to this country's decline in moral standards, therefore taking the easy way out by looking the other way.

Undoubtedly the present administration hopes to claim pre-emptive vindication at the polls even though these cohorts have been caught red-handed. There's been so much cover-up concerning Whitewater, the Travel Office abuse of police power, the obstruction of justice in the billings records, the abuse of executive privilege to conceal political embarrassment and six months of missing FBI files, among major concerns.

If our personal files and records were missing for six months, I'd need a file to rasp my way out of lockup. However, a forced vacation might just be the ticket. We all have character flaws, but it's difficult to respect the leaders of this country when there's been so much corruption. There appears to be a shortage of present-day George Washingtons.

Some folks are trying to overregulate many aspects of people's lives. The "can't do's" are overwhelming. On a larger scale, the massive wilderness set-asides and rigid forest restrictions have literally backfired. Misguided management has left some riparian zones in poor condition. As the result of repealing salvage logging, this summer's fires consumed live trees and left acres of barren ground due to excessive fuel loads from dead and dying trees. A hands-off attitude towards these buffer strips along streams will not solve the problem.

Water controversy stems from the fish habitat issue, a series of drought years, more energy needs and the need to produce more food for our growing population. Fish can be a tasty main dish item, but it isn't a vital nutritional requirement. People like Dr. Shipsey who want to eliminate beef, should also delete fish from the diet. However, it's strange that, according to reports, about 53,000 salmon from Alaskan waters are wasted each year and the market for canned salmon is glutted. Good sense dictates that the Northwest economy is more important than preserving a playground of vast proportions.

Measure 38 proponents say that backpackers are forced to boil drinking water because of cows. They neglect to mention that there are no cows allowed in wilderness areas and many forested areas. Perhaps it's all right to drink "clean water" where the deer and the antelope play. And if I had my druthers, I would have to be mighty thirsty to partake where slimy salamanders, frogs and other water creatures live.

Don't take the easy out by not going to the polls on election day. Your vote does count, especially if legislation is passed that marks absent votes as "against" measures. There's a whole lot of dirt shoveling that needs to be done before any bridges can be built for roads into the next century.
