Off the Wall

Although waiting around, bag in hand, no flying saucer has come to pick me up in the wake of the Hale-Bopp comet. So much for being transported to a higher plane of life. Maybe it's due to my earthbound boots that have slogged through a sea of mud. Nikes just aren't high enough to cut the mustard, especially the times we've got stuck in bog holes.

However, the influence of this bright, streaking comet is evident in other ways. For instance, twin calves arrived during this awesome solar exhibit. The mother cow decided she liked Hale, but refused to have anything to do with Bopp. So again we have a bucket baby, but then calf slobbers and the aroma of sicko calves is the essence of spring on a cattle ranch. Meanwhile the geese are nesting and the wildflowers are in bloom. But it's hardly been warm enough to expose these white gams by wearing shorts. Surely April will bring balmy days with less chilling winds or frosty nights.

After doting so much care on newborn babies we continue to be meat eaters-out of habit, I suppose. But I haven't a problem with those who prefer lentils, cheese or peanut butter in lieu of meat. However, the most slanted promotion of vegetarianism was printed in a children's magazine called "Muse" that has a large circulation and comes from the publishers of the "Smithsonian" magazine in Chicago.

On this magazine cover is a picture of a cute, white-faced calf with the caption that reads, "Please Don't Eat Me!" Inside, there are pictures of children with statements as to why they don't eat meat. Their reasons vary from cruelty to animals to wasting resources to impacting the environment. One quote says, "It's easier to kill plants for food because they don't fight back."

It would be interesting to see how fast these adults that influence such thinking could run if they were close at hand while a protective cow tries to wipe out a caretaker doctoring her sick calf. Picture a grandmother wielding a baseball bat while the doctor, her son, wrestles a sick calf about on the ground-a likely instance for a funniest video by an observer. Perhaps it's that resistance to tender care and the bruises incurred that causes us to bite back in the form of a tender steak.

Everyone to their own taste, however. But now the USDA has to into the act by allowing eight ounces of yogurt to be substituted for the required three ounces of meat, or its equivalent in school lunches. While they have done wonders with yogurt by flavoring it, I recall the many trips to the pig pen with sour-smelling skim milk and whey.

When they talk about cruelty to animals through confinement, dairy cows are among the most restricted. Lord knows when it comes to pollution, these cows take the prize. Meanwhile beef cows forage on otherwise unusable grasses or by-products and grain not fit for human consumption. Consumers should be more knowledgeable about food sources in order to make informed choices. The whey of it is that one can slurp yogurt that also contains gelatin made from cow bones. And it's good to chomp raw veggies like a bunny, but for a soul-satisfying, stick-to-the-ribs meal, there's nothing like a protein-loaded, mineral-rich, lean piece of meat. Just skip the waist-expanding chocolate cake-oh sure!
