Volunteer refinishes trail

George Jefferies
George Jefferies' middle name is "volunteer"--or at least it should be.

The 81-year-old resident of the St. Patrick's Senior Center in Heppner is responsible for almost single-handedly refinishing the Willow Creek Dam trail.

The city dumped five yards of gravel on the top of the trail and Jefferies, with a hand truck and five gallon bucket, hauled seven gallons of gravel at a time to refinish the trail.

"It was getting pretty worn down," said Jefferies.

"I didn't keep track of time," Jefferies added. "I just worked on it until I got tired."

Jefferies moved to Heppner almost 10 years ago from Mount Shasta, California. He and his sons had come to the area to hunt, staying at a trailer at Blake Ranch. After he looked around the Heppner area, he decided to relocate, and, by November of that year, he moved up here.

His sons live in the Portland area.

Jefferies is a retired construction glass cutter and had worked in Hawaii for a time.

Items of Health - Tobacco Prevention by Karen Masshoff

I want to speak to the notion that Tobacco Prevention may be anti-business, that some activities we do with youth are inappropriate to maintaining good relations with our local merchants and restaurant owners. These activities such as Operations Storefront and Reward and Reminder are designed to be educative for both the young people and the retailers, not punitive. Over 90 percent of the business people with whom we've interacted have responded favorably toward Tobacco Prevention and its activities.

What is at stake here is good health for our community. How would we respond if one of the industry's big-three tobacco manufacturers were to set up a plant somewhere on Willow Creek and started to put their waste of nicotine, chromium, ammonia, benzene, etc. into the water, into the reservoir? Yet many of us make the decision to inhale these materials into our lungs and to swallow some of this stuff down our guts.

As mature adults, "free agents," we can make the choice above to poison ourselves. Questions: is it our "right" to expose others -- our children -- to the dangerous chemicals of secondhand smoke? What is the wisdom of compromising our financial future via the major expense of tobacco use? Finally, should we allow the addiction (yes, addiction, like what happens with the use of cocaine or heroin) of our young people by giving free rein to those who would profit from their addiction and suffering?

How we answer these questions in the collective might very well be translated into the economic health of our greater community. With the pace of modern living, the outcome of our actions will become apparent sooner than later.
