Kids to get hands dirty at Watershed Field Days

Students from Umatilla and Morrow counties will have the opportunity to learn about bugs, soil, water and weather while getting their hands dirty during the hands-on 10th annual Watershed Field Days, sponsored by the Umatilla-Morrow Education Service District (UMESD).

Beginning Monday and going on through Friday, elementary school students will learn first-hand about the environment that surrounds them, straight from the experts. Students will travel to one of three locations - McKay Creek in Pendleton, Willow Creek in Lexington, or the Umatilla River (Oxbow site) in Hermiston - and learn from meteorologists, hydrologists, soil/water conservationists, fish and wildlife department officials and more. Each location provides a perfect stream setting for this learning environment.

This is the 10th year of Watershed Field Days, which staff from the UMESD plan and coordinate each year. A special lunch each day will mark the celebration of a decade of the event. The event has been coordinated for the past several years by Craig Satter, a community and business liaison for the UMESD.

Students will get the chance to use various tools of the trade, look at soil samples and bugs, and learn how mapping is conducted, among other fun activities.

Teachers for the Willow Creek location include Dennis Hull for weather station, Clint Carlson for plant identification, Larry Lutchner for soils development and formation, Gary Hunt and Ione students for macro-invertebrate sampling and identification, Deiter Waite for water quality monitoring and testing, Duane Neiffer for mapping; math in natural resources-compass, and Bill Ewing for stream bank rehabilitation and restoration.
