

CO-GEN PLANT

-Continued from Page ONE met Tuesday morning with members of the Willow Creek Economic Development Group and went over plans and ideas with them also. WCVEDG members also liked what they heard and agreed to write a letter of support in favor of the endeavor.

Christensen said the sorghum is a hybrid developed by a California company called Ceres that must be grown under center pivot irrigation and can get up to 20 feet tall. He said the advantage of using agricultural product rather than wood waste to burn in the co-gen plant is control over the condition of the material. He said with sorghum they can control the moisture content between 30 and 40 percent, and it is generally cleaner than wood. "The trouble with wood waste is the moisture content can be all over the place," he said. "And it can have foreign matter included."

He said trucking the material from the Hermiston area where there is more irrigated land would not be a problem, but admitted that if he could get irrigated growers on board in South Morrow County he would, which would save on transportation costs. He met with Hermiston area growers in February and April and there are currently six growers who have crops in the ground. The grower's co-op located in the Ontario area is looking at putting in a 20 megawatt generating plant and also has a pellet operation that sends the sorghum pellets as far away as England. "They are trying to convert from coal power over there and pay premium prices," he said.

Christensen said growers should expect to get 15 to 20 tons an acre of the sorghum and that the co-op is looking for around 5,000 acres to supply the Heppner plant. He said they have 10 growers in the Ontario area and they are averaging 16 to 19 tons per acre. He said the co-op is working on financing to get a co-gen plant operating in that area. Christensen has lived and farmed in the Treasure Valley area for many years, and is well known there. Heppner Mayor Les Paustian, who is originally from the area, said he did not "know" Christensen, but knew "of him".

Growers in that area formed a co-op, Agri Energy Producers, to control the process from growing to distribution to producing electricity. According to a Feb. 10, 2010, article in the Argus Observer, Christensen said his company had retained Randon Wilson to direct the organization and the financing of the co-op. Wilson directed in the organization of the Snake River Sugar Co-op, the growers group which bought out Amalgamated Sugar Co., and another growers' co-op, United Onions USA, Inc. Christensen said Wilson was probably the best co-op attorney in the western, of not the entire, United States.

The Heppner City Council liked what it heard Monday night and voted unanimously to write a letter of support for the project. "Three different outfits have tried, but none has made it. We think this one is a good fit (for Heppner)," Paustian said.

A company called T2, Inc. was the latest business to look at opening the co-gen plant. T2 had planned on burning wood waste but did not exercise an earlier option to purchase the plant from the Port of Morrow.
