Community Bank announces $500 photo contest

As part of America Saves Week 2016, scheduled for Feb. 22-27, Community Bank is sponsoring a $500 photo contest and is spreading the saving message and urging people in the community to make their savings automatic as part of America Saves Week.

Community Bank is announcing a new contest to celebrate America Saves Week. The "HAMilton Saves!" contest involves entering a photo of HAMilton, the Community Bank pink piggy bank, and an explanation of your savings goal. You do not have to be a customer to enter. You can pick up your own HAMilton piggy bank now from a local Community Bank branch to get started. Entry into the contest begins Feb. 19 and ends Feb. 25. A bank selection committee will determine the winner from all eligible entries based on the quality/creativity of the photo along with the content of the savings goal description. The winner, announced on Feb. 26, will receive $500 to use towards their savings goal. Entrants must be 13 years old or older to enter. To see complete contest rules, ask for a copy at your local branch of Community Bank or visit www.communitybanknet.com/files/Hamilton_Saves_Rules.pdf.

NRCS releases February Water Supply Outlook Report

Normal to above-normal snowpack continues across Oregon

PORTLAND—Oregon's mountain snowpack remains at normal to above-normal levels and continues to surpass last year's peak levels, according to the February Water Supply Outlook Report released today by the USDA Natural Resources Conservation Service.

Today's statewide average snowpack is 121 percent of normal. Portions of southeastern Oregon are experiencing the highest snowpack levels due to above-normal precipitation that fell as snow throughout January. The Owyhee Basin in Malheur County measures the highest in the state today for snow water equivalent at 153 percent of normal. Snow water equivalent is the amount of water that is stored inside the snowpack. In Western Oregon, snowpack is closer to normal in the Mt. Hood and Willamette Basins, but the Rogue/Umpqua Basin is well above normal at 139 percent today.

Storms continued to blanket Oregon's mountains with snow in January.

The mountain temperatures for February and March will determine whether mountain precipitation continues to fall as snow or rain, which will have a large impact on the summer water supply picture.

"With about half of the snow season left, we are still hopeful that the current trends of precipitation and snowpack continue through the spring," said Scott Oviatt, NRCS Oregon snow survey supervisor. "In Eastern Oregon, we are seeing well-above normal snow levels that are not typically met until springtime."

According to the February report, streamflow forecasts call for near-average to well-above-average volumes for the summer water supply season. Some of the highest forecasts are in southeastern Oregon. However, hydrologists continue to caution that it's still early in the snowpack accumulation season, and summer projections are likely to change.

"Each month that we receive normal or above-normal amounts of snow and precipitation, that will boost the probability that snowmelt runoff will help alleviate the impacts of long-term drought and sustain river and stream flows throughout the summer," Oviatt said.

The latest information on Oregon's streamflow forecasts can be found in the February Water Supply Outlook Report available on the NRCS Oregon website.

The NRCS Snow Survey is the federal program that measures snow and provides streamflow forecasts and snowpack data across the West. In Oregon, snow measurements are collected from 81 SNOTEL sites, 42 manually measured snow courses, and 26 aerial markers. Water and snowpack data for all Oregon sites are updated every hour and are at: www.or.nrcs.usda.gov/snow.
