-Continued from PAGE ONE need to spend it on rolling stock and capital improvements," she said.

Huwe said Irrigon is growing and showing more community pride and, although she praised Boardman for providing all the economic growth in the county, now is not the time to take services away from Irrigon.

"I am very concerned about Irrigon losing these facilities," she told the court.

She said Irrigon is already a bedroom community, but the new high school helped restore a lot of the city's sense of pride and unity. She pointed out that with Irrigon's new parks, new library and high school people are starting to take ownership in the community.

"Please don't take that away from us," she urged.

"We are not anywhere close to making a decision. We know it is important for communities to have county facilities," county judge Terry Tallman said.

He said more study was needed and the costs better examined, saying, "we are going to have a very good discussion on this."

There was also discussion on whether the new county court, which takes over in January and will have two new members, should make the decision on new facilities and where they should be located. However, no decision was made on that.

In other business at the Aug. 3 meeting the court approved a new fee schedule for the county, covering everything from what a copy of the budget costs to code enforcement fees.

The court also heard from county planner Carla McLane, who said she had received two resignations from the planning commission, David Sykes, who is also chairman, and Melissa Lindsay. Sykes said he was resigning because the newspaper planned on writing more stories about the planning commission and county court, and he did not want there to be a conflict of interest. Lindsay was elected to the county court in the last election, so she also cannot serve on the planning commission. All planning commission decisions go to the court for final approval. The resignations both take affect following the October planning commission meeting.

McLane also said that the planning commission will be holding a work session Aug. 30 at the Bartholomew Building in Heppner to discuss the Farm and Forest Model Code Update.

In other business the court approved a request by the Morrow County Sheriff's Department to purchase 20 sets of updated body armor protection. The cost for the level-four tactical protection is $8,500 total; however, the body armor can withstand an AR rifle bullet.
