a 100-year supply of land its owner says. Metro also was reportedly pleased with the sustainability aspect of Finley Buttes, which pipes methane gas out of the ground from the deteriorating garbage and uses it to produce electricity, including heat to dry onions at a nearby facility.

Commissioner Jim Doherty asked about the increased truck traffic and also said that eastern Oregon is the "playground" for recreationists from the Portland metro area, and is also "energy central" for that area's power needs through gas, solar and wind generation. Eastern Oregon receives 65 percent of Portland and Salem's bio-waste and "Metro needs to appreciate what we do for them, and vice-versa," Doherty said.

Commissioner Melissa Lindsay pointed out that her family farm is a neighbor to Finley Buttes and it's in her view on a daily basis. She said she regards it as a growing hill and not a growing dump. She said Finley Buttes responds quickly to complaints and maintains open and frequent communications with the board of commissioners.

Elder said the request for proposals from each of these landfills will be issued next month, with responses evaluated in spring of 2018, negotiations held in the summer of 2018 and the new contract taking effect January 1, 2020. It is anticipated that the new contract will be for 10 years, with the possibility of up to two five-year extensions.

In addition to a request for proposals for landfill disposal of waste, Metro will ask for separate proposals for transportation contracts to deliver the waste from Metro Central and Metro South transfer stations to the selected landfill.
