Gray wolf removed from Endangered Species list

4-H board of directors chosen

The U.S. Department of Interior recently announced the official delisting of the gray wolf from the Endangered Species List based on clear evidence that the wolves’ numbers are healthy and stable following decades of successful protection. This change will provide much-needed relief for ranchers by enabling them to prevent livestock from being targeted by wolf packs.

“Oregon’s wolf population grew over 15 percent last year, and meanwhile, wolves continue to kill livestock in the area under federal management, with little recourse for local ranchers. The action by the Trump Administration to officially delist the gray wolf from the Endangered Species List is long overdue. This move will allow our state wildlife officials to manage the wolves more effectively by allowing for a single management plan under local control,” said Representative Greg Walden (R-Hood River).

The U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service has recognized the recovery of the gray wolf and first proposed delisting it in 2013 under the Obama Administration, but litigation by outside groups brought the process to a crawl. Walden has been a longtime advocate for returning authority for protecting and managing gray wolves to individual states. In 2016, the House passed Walden’s plan to remove the gray wolf from the Endangered Species list.

Before the announcement, management of wolves in Oregon was divided along arbitrary lines that left wolves in the eastern third of the state under Oregon state management, while the remainder were managed under the federal Endangered Species Act. Now, all wolves in Oregon will be managed by the State of Oregon, which will ensure that the wolf population remains at a healthy level and that livestock are protected.

of the association executive team, two community members at large and three 4-H volunteers. The group will meet on an annual basis to provide a financial review and program input to help propel Morrow County 4-H forward.

Association officers are Heidi Nelson, president; Kellie Nelson, vice president; Andrea Fletcher, secretary and Torie Rice, treasurer. The 4-H volunteers are Wes Killion, Brandi Orem and Annie Phillpott. Community At Large representatives are Lisa Middlesdorf and Marcie Rodelo.
