Staking Tomatoes. A bulletin issued by the Georgia Experiment Station gives some interesting results from tests of staking and training tomato plants. One plant was pruned to one stem and tied to a stake with raffia; plant 2 was pruned to two stems and tied to stake; plant 3 was pruned to three stems and tied to stake; plant 4 was neither pruned nor staked. Plant 3 gave the highest yield, and plant 2 gave a higher yield than the unpruned, unstaked plant. The bearing season of the pruned, staked plants was much longer than that of the plants left to care for themselves. The fruit on the staked, pruned plants was likewise larger and more free from defects.

The authors of the bulletins conclude that for the home garden and for limited truck areas, where earliness of maturity and length of season are important considerations, it will pay to stake and prune tomato plants. In growing tomatoes for canneries, the extra yields will hardly justify the extra expense.
