LAFFERTY'S WIT DIRECTED AT W. J. BRYAN

Representative Lafferty, undaunted by the portentous influences of a democratic administration, assails the mighty Bryan in a speech of caustic wit that has been duly reported and printed in the Congressional Record. It may be found in full on page 6259, in the issue of March 31. From the speech the following extract is taken:

Mr. Speaker, the democratic ship of state, with Mr. Bryan as aviator, has now been up in the air for more than a year. (Laughter.)

Soon after the democrats came into power the premier of the Wilson administration took his place in the party biplane and aviated to California. It was a new machine, just from the factory. It was supplied with all the necessities for a four-year cruise in the diplomatic heavens, including a large quantity of grape juice. (Laughter.)

On the west coast the ship encountered dangerous cross currents of racial prejudice. The baffling breezes of protest and indignation buffeted the ship about for several weeks, and the aviator's feet became cold. (Laughter and applause.) He decided to return to the East, where he gave many exhibitions of looping the loop before large Chautauqua audiences. Thereby the aviator augmented the meager and insufficient salary which Uncle Sam was paying him.

After sailing around the Chautauqua circuit in triumph, the aviator struck out boldly for a long-distance flight to the south, intending to make a landing on the Rio Grande, where he could "watch and wait." (Laughter.) But near the Mexican border he was suddenly precipitated into air pockets of treachery which damaged his planes. His cylinders began to miss fire. His carburetor got out of adjustment. He was unable to land on the Rio Grande.

In desperation the airman of the administration was seized with the idea that he could regain his reputation as an international aviator by doing "the large thing," sailing farther to the south, and giving to the other nations of the world a free exhibition by landing on the Panama canal. His fuel was almost exhausted. He attempted to fire his engines with a mysterious fuel not known to the rest of the country. But his carburetor immediately became choked up with "matters of greater delicacy and nearer consequence." (Laughter.) A rain of protest short-circuited his ignition wires and burnt out his batteries. The engine stopped. The aviator is now volplaning toward the rocks.

Our airship of state will be brought back safely to earth and started out right when the Sims bill is defeated.

Let us hope that the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. Sims) will again take the floor in support of his bill just before the roll call, and that he will propose to the faithful followers of the administration on this bill the following "free-tolls yell," a la Princeton:

"For all true patriots that's enough; We sneeze in concert, one, two, three, Kerchew! Kerchew! Kerchew! Kerchew!"
