The First Assistant Cashier

By Kenneth Carlyle Beatson, in L. A. Times

ONES' daughter cupped her chin come out it was best to get them out in the palm of her hand and as quickly as possible. turned her clear gray eyes full For several moments Gertie silently upon her father. "Please tell me just what it will mean if I refuse him, " she said.

Jones wanted to lie to her. He wanted to assure her that it would mean no more if she refused to marry Quigley than if she should refuse to marry any. one else. But he found that with those clear eyes upon him he somehow could not do so. A lie exposed to those eyes would perish as certainly and as quickly as filth exposed to the sun. "I'm afraid," he told her, "it will mean that by this time next week the Beardstown National Bank will have a now first assistant cashier."

Then he slowly wet his lips. Those lips seemed utterly bloodless. His entire face seemed bloodless, for that matter; and one somehow suspected that his whole body was, too. A friend had once laughingly remarked that his blood had all been absorbed by the firm for which he had worked the last 85 years. That friend never guessed how near he had come to the truth.

A light flamed up in the girl's eyes. Jones saw it and forestalled what he knew she was about to say.

"No, Gertie, I don't mean that," he said. Quigley wouldn't have me let out because you refused to marry him. He isn't that kind I'm sure he would want you to come to him absolutely of your own accord or not at all." "Then-what do you mean?"

Jones raised a shaky right hand to his chin. That hand did not shake merely because of any momentary excitement. It had started shaking 15 years before, and it had grown more and more shaky every year since.

"Gertie," he said quietly, "I am 66 years old. Now, the first assistant in a bank is required to do a great deal of work. He is required to do all of his own work, part of the work of those below him and most of the work of those above him. To do all this and to windows. An automobile whirled around do it well is a task that is difficult of performance for even a young man. For a man of my age it is absolutely impossible of performance. So, you bank. Jones caught a glimpse of his see_" get that you've slaved for the bank rear entrance and rapped sharply three half of your life; that you've-" not much sentiment in any business, without question; it was not unusual There cannot be. And there is probably for Jones to come back to his office at loss sentiment in the banking business night. Few first assistants can do all than in any other. When a first assist the work they are required to do in ant remains a first assistant until he their regular working hours. is no longer able to do all the work Straight to his desk went Jones. that is given him, he is practically al- There, still guided merely by fancy, he that they intend to let you out just ing to have his first salary check now !'' studied the carpet; then she sullenly to even make a will. And directly looked up with a bright smile.

"I see, father," she said; "and I'll marry Mr. Quigley, of course. That's a little enough thing to do for a father who's done so much for me."

"You'll marry him if you love him, and not otherwise," he said decisively. 'I haven't told you this to influence you. I've told it to you because I've never been able to lie to you. If I thought you had married a man for my sake whom you did not love, I could not live." And the manner in which he said this last would have convinced any jury in the world that he was telling the truth.

Just then the maid came into the room, a tray in her hand. Gertie took up the card on the tray and glanced at it.

"It's Tommy Travis," she said, looking up-and Jones saw a little path of red come into the cheek that was turned toward him. "Tell him we'll be right in, Mary."

A moment later they went into the parlor to greet the visitor. Travis was tall, tanned, and 22; a college athlete by his looks, but actually a book-keeper. He came of a very aristocratic, very highly respected, very poor family. Eugenically, he was an ideal sonin-law for anyone; financially, he was not.

Jones did not stay long in the parlor. but quickly took himself off to his club. He did not stay long at the club, for he found cards, companions and billiards all equally depressing. Leaving the club, he walked slowly up the street, not knowing or caring where he was going. And presently he found himself in front of the Beardstown National Bank.

He stood there on the sidewalk a moment, gazing at the heavy plate-glass the corner, and its headlight fell full upon the window just before him, lighting up plainly the interior of the own desk; and then, giving way to an "But surely, father, they won't for- odd fancy, he walked around to the times. After a moment the night watch-"My dear," Jones smiled, "there is man opened the door. He let Jones in ways replaced by a younger man. This got up on his high stool and sat look. is not right; possibly, but it is inevit- ing out through his window, just as he able, and no one is to be censored for did when a line of people stood there. it. The life-or the health, at least- He remembered the first time he had of the bank requires that it be done." He remembered the first time he had "Have you any reason for thinking had stood in that line of people, wait-cashed. What a wonderful thing that "Yes. Sanders, who is under me, is bit of paper had seemed! In imagina-a son-in-law of Lakers, the president of tion he pictured his life from that day Suddenly Jones saw light. He saw had done and why she what she the board of directors. It has come to on. Now he was standing tremblingly crying about it, and he saw, too, what 178 East 60th Street, Portland, Oregon me that Sanders has been telling about before Major Black, then president of that he expects to be at my desk by the bank, asking for a position. Now to his face. his course must be. He forced a smile the middle of next week. This means, he was working as a clerk-working "Well, Gertie, what are you crying of course, that Lakers will try to have furiously that he might gain notice and about?" he asked. "You're not sorry me let out at the next meeting of the advancement. Now he was again you accepted him already, are you?" standing before Major Black, blushing Gertie brightened a little behind her at the other's words of commendation tears. and hearing that he was to be made "But-but Mr. Quigley won't-" "I know what's bothering you, " said the bank steps, facing a surging, sullen "Oh, bother Quigley!" Jones ex-Jones. "You're wondering where Quig- mob of men and women, pleading with elaimed lightly-he made it come lightley comes in. I'll tell you. No one is them, begging them not to bring ruin ly. "I wouldn't think of allowing you ever let out without the vote of the on themselves and the bank by deto marry him unless you loved him, board being unanimous-no one above manding their deposits. At first it was and you know it. Anyhow, what if I the position of clerk, that is. Now, like trying to beat down a fortress am let out of the Beardstown National? Lakers is president of the board and with pebbles, and his words brought I can get-" He paused a moment and a man of much influence, and few of forth only sneers and cat-calls. Graduswallowed. He had meant to say that the directors would care to hold out ally, though, the sneers disappeared and he could get plenty of other positiona, against him. Quigley is one that might. He would be certain to do so if he knew that I was to be his father in-law. Do you sea?'' began to turn shamefacedly away, and no danger of me starving to death. I Nobody but Jones himself could ever the rest, sheep-like, began to follow. was unstrung when I talked to you realize what it was costing him to talk Now Major Black was sobbing out his this evening, and things seemed worse like this to Gertie. But he could not thankfulness; telling him that he had than they were. Now, brighten up, my help it. When a little child, Gertie had saved the bank, and that the bank dear, and tell me more about Tommy.' turned those clear gray eyes upon him would know how to reward him. Now An hour later Gertie, reassured and and asked him the truth about Santa he was sitting at the first assistant happy, left the room. As the door Claus, and he had told it to her, and cashier's window for the first time. closed after her, Jones relaxed in his never since had he been able to tell How bright the world had seemed that chair and sighed deeply. Just then he her anything but the truth. He felt morning! There had not been a sign felt a very, very old man. now that as long as the facts had to of a cloud in the sky. He was to be When Quigley called early the next married in a week to the most won- morning to take Gertie auto riding, he derful girl in the world, and the received her answer to the question he cashier's desk, with its salary of $5000 had asked her two days before. a year, had seemed but a step away.

Just a step away-yet 25 years were to bring it not one inch closer! It might have been different in Major Black had lived. But one morning the Major's heart had gone back on him and he had died without having time thereafter things began to break badly for Jones.

Black's death had left room for a step up all along the line. What actually happened was that everybody stepped up except Jones, the second assistant being pushed over his head to the cashier's desk. Again Jones lived over the disappointment he had felt then.

One day, some three months later, a messenger boy had come into the bank with word that he was wanted at home at once. When he had arrived there Dr. Anson had opened the door for him. He remembered how grave the expression on the physician's face had been. "You'd better come right upstairs," the other had said. "She's been asking for you."

Upstairs he had found his wife lying in bed, a pink little object beside her. She had smiled weakly at him, closed her eyes, and sighed deeply; and then mule, and I brought the matter up be-Dr. Anson had laid a hand across his shoulders.

simply.

The next time someone had been cared so much. It hadn't seemed to saw that a shadow had fallen across it. matter, somehow. For a long time Evidently a cloud had passed before nothing had seemed to matter very the sun. The words of a song he had much. When he had finally begun to known as a child came back to him, take a new interest in life, he had real- "Somewhere behind the clouds the sun ized that an advancement was out of is shining." He smiled grimly to himthe question. A fixture he was and self and wondered if somewhere behind fixture he would stay. When the the clouds his sun could be shining. others moved, it was taken for granted and as a matter of course that he should stand still.

And now he was to be let out. This was the end, then. After 35 years of slavery, he was to be-the place was very cold. He tried to man as he went out, but somehow what he said did not sound cheerful.

to his room. He had been there but a few minutes when he heard the door open. Glancing up, he saw Gertie com-ing towards him. Her cheeks were unnaturally flushed and her eyes were unnaturally bright. She sat down on the arm of his chair and put her arm around him, and then suddenly she buried her face in his vest front.

"F-father," she sobbed, "I-I ccouldn't. He-he asked me to-to marry him, and I c-couldn't refuse h-him. He only gets s-seventy-five dollars a month, b-but I-I l-love him. "

"Why, what in the world!" exelaimed Jones, raising her face.

"Oh, I-I know I'm ungrateful and and s-selfish, b-but when T-Tommy asked me I e-couldn't say no. I -I j-just c-couldn't. I-''

At 11 the next morning, a boy brought Jones word that the president of the board wanted to see him. Jones had been expecting that. He calmly put everything in perfect order, hung up a "Please call at next window" sign, got down from his stool, took a last look at his desk and window, sighed slightly, and then went to Lakers' of fice.

Lakers glanced up as he entered. "Sit down, Jones," he said.

Jones sat down. Lakers thoughtfully rubbed his chin for a moment.

"Jones," he said, "do you realize that you are getting to be a pretty old man ?''

Jones nodded. He couldn't trust himself to speak just then.

"Yes, you must be somewhere around 65." the other went on. "A man that old can't do the work a first assistant cashier must do, Jones. It's a physical impossibility. The first assistant is the pack-mule of a bank, and everybody takes a turn at riding on him. I've thought for a long time that we ought to have a younger man as our packfore the other directors at the meeting this morning. They all agreed with me, "She's gone, Jones," he had said and we decided to make young Sanders first assistant."

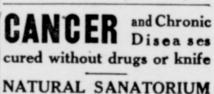

Lakers paused and coughed. Jones shoved over Jones' head he hadn't glanced at the window at his right and

"Yes, Jones," Lakers went on, "we decided that you'd been our pack-mule long enough. A man who has served his firm as long and as faithfully as you have deserves a better reward than that. Now, Winston hasn't been well A clock struck off the hour of ten. for a long time, and his physicians fear Jones started and climbed down from that his lungs are affected. He's his stool. He realized, all at once, that bought a place out in Arizona, and he is going out there next week. We despeak a cheerful word to the watch- eided at the meeting that no one was better fitted or more entitled to fill his place than you. So I take pleasure Reaching home, Jones went straight in informing you, Jones, that from tomorrow on your position will be that of head cashier."

> When Jones looked again at that window he saw that the cloud had gone by and that the sunlight was streaming in brightly. TEN ROSES FREE

Write for Information Today, BEST TIME TO PLANT NOW Satisfaction Guaranteed.

Mountain View Floral Co. East 72nd & Mill Sta., Portland, Oregon.

14

board-and the next meeting is tomorrow morning."

A frown settled on Gertie's face.

law. Do you see?"

How to get 320 Acres Free Do You Want a Homestead? List of Government lands in each State subject to homestead and for what best adapted. Also description of Oregon by Counties. Send for 240-page book, "Ad-vantages of Oregon." Price 50 cents postpaid.

