The Workingmen's Compensation Act.

This law has been in effect about six months and was amended in the legislature "by its friends."

In the lower house of the legislature the socialistic officialism combination was too strong for the business elements.

It was admitted that the Oregon act is exceedingly "liberal" from the standpoint of injuries and death loss and dependents' compensation.

In all respects it pays to beneficiaries of the act 46 per cent more than the Washington Act—its friends admitted that.

The whole fight of the faddists and theorists was to keep the act intact and widen its scope so as to take in more industries.

The statement of Mr. Babcock, who served on the commission a year, that three commissioners at $3600 a year each was too much money for officials went for naught.

The senate bill to have one commissioner with the state Labor commissioner carry on the work was defeated in the house.

The fact that Miss Hobbs did the work of the commission practically alone for two months from January 1st, when she was sworn in, was ignored.

The fact shown by the report that it cost $49,560 to collect $375,508 had no influence on the politicians who were bidding for the labor vote.

The Washington legislature has amended the law in that state in accord with business principals and against the pleas of the labor politicians.

A first aid and waiting period feature has been added, where laborer and employer pay equally into the compensation fund.

Oregon industries are to be still further handicapped by the work of reformers who buy the popular vote with false clamor and other peoples' money.

If there should be an industrial revival in Oregon in the next two years, this compensation act will not have brought it about, say its opponents.

If there is no revival of industries, it will cost the taxpayers too much to operate it.

In spite of its dragnet features, the Oregon law will work in the interests of the casualty companies.

Eyes tested and glasses fitted. Dr. Geo. Inglis.—Adv.
