CHANGING NAMES.

One peculiar effect of the war, in this country, is the inclination of some newly made Americans to change their names to the ones that are more frequently used here and with which the people are familiar. In Boston, for instance, the desire is quite prevalent, but it is noticed that the names having the greatest aristocratic connections are given preference. Such is snobbery among those who have come from king-governed nations.

This idea is in rather striking contrast to another movement which is making headway in the northwest. It is being urged that our mountains and rivers with commonplace names—like Sandy, for instance—be known as far as possible by the names that the Indians originally bestowed upon them. A bill is to be presented to congress next winter to facilitate the movement.

One lake, for example, that stands on the map as McDermot, would be known as Fighting Woman's lake, which might be going back to the Indian idea but would be somewhat inharmonious. The names of many of our greatest mountain peaks would have to be changed to conform to the regulations. We would hardly recognize Hood, St. Helens, Adams, Rainier, Baker, or Jefferson if they had their Indian names handed back to them.

Yet it seems rather incongruous for a person to fix any new appellation on a river or mountain or other object just to suit a private or personal whim. In the Glacier national park up to this summer a waterfall had received no name. A railroad magnate came through the park and as a result of his visit the falls were named Frances, after his daughter. And we can all remember how a railroad corporation tried to change the name of Mt. Rainier as an advertisement for the city of Tacoma.

Yet there is some justification for wanting to get back to some of the original Indian names. Archdeacon Stuck, whose ascent of Mt. McKinley attracted wide attention, is a distinguished supporter of the proposal to use primitive names. After climbing the Alaskan peak, the highest in North America, the archdeacon protested against the name of McKinley, and urged that the mountain thereafter be called Denali, which is an Indian word and signified "The Great One." If congress or the scientific societies were to endeavor to change all the names now attached by common usage to localities, lakes, rivers or mountains the task would be difficult. Exceptions would have to be made, but in the national parks, at least, there should be some regard for the primitive characterizations.

All the earlier names have not been lost. Old maps of the country will show many settlements and natural objects which bear the names taken originally from the Indian. In all parts of the United States are to be found mixtures of the Indian and the nationalities that predominated in their settlement.

In the Pacific states many places are known by English names which have a historical interest. Astoria, for example, could not well bear any other name than that of the pioneer; but when it comes to indiscriminate christening, the Indian words might well have preference, for, as a rule, the Indians named a place after some natural or tribal characteristics.

Cotton seed oil is selling at $50 a ton, the highest price ever paid. The humble doughnut may be in the luxury class before Thanksgiving Day.

Someone has suggested that the great number of new silos going up this year is in anticipation of a dry state of affairs next season.

The reason that a prisoner is often described as being "sunk in dejection" is because his friends couldn't bail him out.

Hallowe'en Day next and it begins to look as if it was going to do a brisk business this year.

WILL HELP OREGON.

In speaking of the Italian government's order for 51,000,000 feet of lumber, principally pine and fir, part of which will be filled by Oregon mills, a lumber dealer in Portland is reported as saying that the business is getting better continually, but foreign orders are not wholly responsible. He says the improvement is largely due to general betterment in business in the east but which will not be appreciable here until the western industries open up. During the past few months, he said, the lumber dealers had been buying conservatively and now that their trade was becoming better they were intending to increase their stocks.

All chances are that the domestic demand for lumber will continually improve. And once the war in Europe is over a great demand for lumber for reconstruction work is expected to come from across the Atlantic.

The lumber industry, one of great importance in Oregon, is not only going to reach its old volume, but it will no doubt attain unprecedented proportions just as soon as conditions are right for the lumber deficiency now accumulating to make itself felt in the market.

Oregon having the greatest amount of standing timber of any state in the union should experience its greatest prosperity when lumber comes to the front again. So should Washington, which is only second to our state in its timber resources.

The Oregonian is making a feeble attempt to knock the county agent idea, but the farmers of Multnomah county will probably do as they please, which means helping themselves to grow larger and better crops.

If Great Britain needs another three billion dollars next spring we will be switched if we are going to dig down again after the first of March. We will have to save up for three months for the Fourth of July.

Since pie season has arrived, but somehow it has a coca-cola flavor and a person can eat two or three quarter sections without becoming afraid of the catawumpuses after he goes to bed.

It's nobody's business, but we are curious to know if anyone has seen any love sonnets written by the president during the past few weeks.

Few people have cause to regret the letter they didn't write.

The Scotch kilt dates back to pre-historic times, it is thought. Originally it was merely a plaid blanket, worn about the shoulders, with one end gathered about the loins in cold weather. The mountaineers of the Balkans wear the kilt, and students say that the soldiers of the Assyrian kings wore a costume very closely akin to the kilt of Scotland.

We believe a great peace victory will be won by the Grand Army women at that chicken pie supper. A gattling gun pumpkin pie thrown in our direction at the same time would create greater havoc than a cow in a cornfield.
