Thrashin' Day.

We saw the men loading the wheat on their wagons as the inter-urban car sped past the wheat field, and all the old enthusiasm of childhood welled up in my heart. It was thrashin' day! Joyful memories pictured the scenes that were transpiring about the farmhouse which was to be honored with serving the wonderful noonday meal. There would be women in the garden gathering beans, cutting cabbages, pulling beets and onions, and women in the back yard stripping the feathers from yellow-legged chickens, and women in the kitchen baking cakes and rows and rows of pies, and girls in the big back porch spreading long snowy cloths on the row of tables which they had succeeded in joining together for the occasion, and children—there would be children swarming everywhere, underfoot and in the way, but having the time of their lives. I could almost taste the gizzards and livers which those children would get to eat out under the trees before dinner, because it was so long to wait until second table.

Well, memory had done her part all right, but I failed to see any signs of commotion about that farmhouse as we passed by. It was a pretty house with a comfortable porch, furnished much as the city porches are, and, with its drawn blinds and closed doors the house looked very calm and cool. There wasn't a woman in sight—or a child. A handsome big touring car stood near the front, in the place of the row of rickety old buggies and gentle family driving horses which used to convey the women of the neighborhood to the scene of the fray. And I don't believe the machine had brought any neighborly help, either for the woman in that house didn't need help. Out in the shade of some tree or shed, were lunch boxes and baskets containing the noon meal, and like as not the woman of the house was getting ready for a run to the city to look up some suburban day bargain which she had read about in the paper as she swung in her shady porch. Ah me! I felt like quoting an old woman of the other days, who used to shake her head, saying wonderfully: "Things wa'n't like this in my day!" It always sounded as if her day was past, and I guess it was, and furthermore, I reckon the same thing is true of any of us when we object to progress of any kind. These men were working with an improved machine. They no longer stand in the terrible chaff and dust, stacking the straw. They don't have to feed the machine, cut the bands or measure the wheat. I don't know what all has been invented to make thrashing easier for the men, but it doesn't take such a raft of men as it used to, so why not let the women folk have things easier, too?

No doubt my little feeling of regret over the change about the farmhouse scene was due to the fact that I experienced only the joys of the old thrashin' days, being one of the children underfoot, and later one of the girls setting the table and naming plates, then watching in giggling groups just inside the kitchen door to see which handsome, sun-burned young giant would draw our plate. I helped pass all the delectable dishes and mind the flies off, but was never really promoted to the responsible place of chief cook, with the all absorbing idea of trying to get up a dinner that would beat all the other women in the company. No doubt if I were the woman of the house on the farm, one who had really tried the old time methods of thrashin' day, I'd welcome the change, and want a machine, too, a mighty swift one, drawn up at the front door ready to carry me away from the scene of action. Any way, I'm never going to give away my age by saying mournfully that any old time method of doing the work in either farmhouse or city house was better than the new way, for I don't want any youngster to think that my day is over.

Cure for Cholera Morbus.
"When our little boy, now seven years old, was a baby he was cured of cholera morbus by Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera and Diarrhoea Remedy," writes Mrs. Sidney Simmons, Fair Haven, N. Y. "Since then other members of my family have used this valuable medicine for colic and bowel troubles with good satisfaction and I gladly endorse it as a remedy of exceptional merit."
