CHRISTMAS NUMBER.

On Tuesday, December 19th, the Outlook will issue its annual Christmas edition of twelve pages. It will be similar in appearance and make-up to previous issues of the same character, and, we hope, a welcome visitor to every household wherever it goes.

Make the Christmas number fully representative of this section we are asking for whatever assistance our correspondents can give us for the occasion. Lengthy, well-written articles from every neighborhood and community will be especially welcome, together with all the advance news of Christmas and other events that are going to happen. Special articles will also be welcomed from everyone who wishes to become a contributor.

There will be a much larger edition printed than usual to supply the demand for extra copies. They may be ordered in advance, either at the office or by mail.

The Christmas paper will be an exceptionally good medium for advertising, and those who cannot be seen are invited to ask for space in its columns. All communications except current news events will be required a week in advance, also advertising requisitions.

ABOUT BOOKKEEPING.

Not long since, only a few years ago, the farmer was the only man in the country who was accused formally, informally, daytime and at night, of being the one business man who did not keep books. And the lecturers of the grange or the Farmers' Alliance, or, maybe the farmers' institutes, were always busy with the problem of getting the farmer to know where he stood, financially.

They said a lot of hard things about the agriculturist as a business man—and most of them were true.

But at that—the farmer seems not to be the only one who does not post his business transaction in a ledger and himself on his own financial condition.

The national trade commission after a series of investigations extending from Maine to California and from the great lakes to the gulf of Mexico reports that not more than ten per cent of the merchants and manufacturers in this country know their cost of doing business.

There are comparatively few efficient concerns in the United States, says the commission, and these get the profitable business. The others—those who have neither business judgment nor bookkeeping ability—constitute the 22,000 cases handled by the bankruptcy courts every year.

And, contrary to general belief, the trade commission finds that corporations as a rule are not money makers. Of 260,000 doing business in the United States, 60,000 are doing a profitable business. The other 200,000 are barely getting along. Only 50,000 of the entire number make as much as $5000 a year clear money.

The commission says, too, that of the 60,000 corporations doing a gross business of $100,000 a year, half of them know so little of business methods that they charge off nothing for depreciation of plant or machinery.

And with these statements regarding the "business men" of the country before him, the farmer will never have cause again to feel himself their inferior in the matter of methods. He is about as good a business man as the rest of them, and his bank account in this year of Our Lord 1916 shows it.

THE PASSING NEED.

A writer in the Outlook magazine suggests that a pressing need of the times is a little personal meditation and silence. Others have advocated the same thing, here and there a few placid souls, especially in summer time, are wont to practice it.

Silence and meditation are, with them, indeed, apparently confirmed habits, to which, for generous measure, a blissful inactivity is added. They toil not—neither do they worry. And this state of untroubled serenity they maintain continuously.

Not many of us can afford a similar indulgence, but the Outlook essayist contends that a little of it daily would be a benefit not only to the individual, but to the public as a whole.

There is too much noise, he insists, and not enough settled principles. We lack fundamental convictions, probably because we lack the time in which to acquire them. We question, deny, challenge and, everywhere men and women are talking at the top of their voices; no mysteries are inviolate; no experiences are too sacred to be reported; no details of crime are so revolting that they can not be spread out for the reading of children." He continues:

The passion for speech has not only robbed silence of things once committed to its keeping, but has made it almost obsolete. The world is filled with the uproar of fierce debate, recrimination, charge and counter-charge; the newspapers tell the story of the day's doings in headlines, gigantic capitals advertise remedies for quieting nerves, and scores of best-sellers among novels "start with a rush and end with a bang."

Not much of that can be denied. The world is noisy, and not the least of its noise emerges from youth, which, finding things for the first time, imagines that they have never been found before, and so proclaims its discovery. Middle age is less clamorous and old age, surely, adds very little to the hubbub. There are many "isms" and youth is accountable for most of them. But, unfortunately, it is a difficult thing to induce youth to assume the contemplative frame of mind. It has little regard for the virtues of silence and meditation. When there is yelling going on, it is less likely to sit quietly and reflect inwardly than it is to add to the volume of sound.

But there is value in the suggestion. Americans need an army of evangelists of the gospel of quiet. If we ever organized such a thing, however, there would probably be a terrible clamor over the brand of quiet best adapted to our needs.

The new 1917 ten-cent piece has appeared and it confirms the belief that every attempt to improve upon the old impressions of American coins has been a failure. Possibly the only one that possesses some artistic merit is the Lincoln penny, and even that could be improved upon. The Buffalo nickel is a monstrosity, and the new dime lacks much of the beauty of the one with which people have been so long acquainted. A comparison of the new issues with the old, including the gold coins, is not at all complimentary to the new school of art. The designers might try their hands at "cubist" coin—the latest fad in art circles.

Six months' mourning for the late Franz Josef of Austria! And what about the two million Austrian soldiers who have fallen in two years? What is the loss of any ruler compared with the youth, the love, the hopes, that have been swallowed up in despair and death?

The success of Onizero Zesditu, the mother of Lidj Jeassu, the young emperor of Abyssinia, in overthrowing the authority of her son should encourage mothers in this country who are having trouble with cheery young American sovereigns.

Now, if the governor of Guam, who has asked for a shipment of hungry toads, had just asked for a shipment of hungry people, the requisition, in these days of h. c. of I. could have been filled easily and quickly enough.

It's nice to contemplate that Red Cross seals have not been affected by high prices and an accommodating postoffice department will allow you to use them free of charge on the reverse side of your Christmas parcel.

If we remain steadfast until the poultry show is over and the exhibits go back to their coops, our chances to enter the new year without a charge of grand larceny against us will be greatly improved.

Our next trip to Washington will be for the purpose of hearing the first debate between Miss Rankin and one of the untrifled provided the subject under discussion has any promise of fireworks in it.

Emperor Charles Francis lost no time in assuring the kaiser that he will fight it out, which, under the conditions in Austria, is about all he could think to say, anyway.

The longer the guard stays on the border the harder it must be for Carranza to decide whether it is a threat or an example.

Food is the hyphen which joins the body and soul. Who would seek to discard it? And it is not un-American to eat.

The democratic national committee is worrying about a $300,000 deficit. But wasn't it worth the money?

The trapping season for fur-bearing animals is now open, so be sure that nobody gets your goat.

FACTORY PROTECTION.

A petition is being circulated among the business men, asking the city council to extend a 4-inch main along Division street from Main street to the auto factory.

The petitioners say: "We believe that this is an urgent need and should be done as a protection to an industry now being built up within the city, which is entitled to the concession."

It would seem to us that there should be no hesitancy in granting this request. The late destruction of the cannery emphasizes the need of adequate protection of any industry, but it has heretofore been the policy to let such industries protect themselves to a great extent. Such a policy, if continued, will not help to locate factories here. The Outlook believes the petition should be granted.

Women hold many executive educational positions in the United States. Of the 12,000 conspicuous positions, largely of an administrative character, 2,500 are held by women. They include college presidents, state and county superintendents of education, directors of industrial schools, heads of departments in colleges and universities, directors of schools for afflicted and librarians. Twenty-four out of 622 colleges and universities are presided over by women. Of the nearly 3,000 county superintendents, 508 are women. Of the seventy institutions for the blind fifteen are directed by women.

Holland is to have a leper colony. The country is exposed to the leprosy danger owing to the considerable traffic with its East and West Indian colonies, and there are estimated to be roughly between thirty and forty sufferers from the disease already within its borders. Plans are on foot to found such a colony in the Veluwe region, between Epe and Heerde. It will be under the control of officers of the Salvation Army who have had experience of this work in the Netherlands East Indies.

Bethune, which is on the road to Peronne, is a French town with a fascinating history, and is now in the throes of the great struggle, as the possession of these two towns means the gaining of the German defense of Picardy. Bethune is situated on a rock facing the river Brett. Until 1713 it was of Flemish occupation, and in the early ages the Scottish family of Bethune is said to have gone from here to England with William of Normandy.

Mrs. Mary A. Blodgett, age 97, of Winsted, Conn., enjoyed a 44 mile automobile ride. At the end of the hour and fifteen-minute ride Mrs. Blodgett expressed the hope that she might have many more automobile rides before she reached the century mark. Mrs. Blodgett says she recalls having seen Lafayette in 1824 in Hudson N. Y., when she was five years old.

Twelve state universities have in the last year added college courses in "Lumber and Its Uses" to their college curriculums. These schools are Syracuse university and the following state universities: Maine, Wisconsin, Idaho, Washington, Oregon, California, Colorado, Georgia, Iowa, Pennsylvania and Massachusetts.

The largest teapot in the world was made at Shigarki, 200 miles from Tokio, Japan. It measures three feet three inches in diameter and without the handle is three feet, six inches high. When the wicker handle is raised the teapot is five feet, six inches high.

This is the lodge election month but we don't hear about any betting on the results.

A Grouchy Remark.

"I see somebody has perfected a bronze paint. I wonder what that is intended for?"

"For women with iron jaws, I s'pose," suggested the other man.

Exchange.

"A man has a right to change his opinions." "Yes," replied Senator Sorghum, "but he has to be careful not to get cheated in the trade and come out worse off than when he started."

The Old House.

There it was, the old house, just across the alley, the moonlight soft upon it. The one who never seemed to care was a guest in the house of a friend, and the friend had always lived just across the alley from the old house—a comfortable sort of arrangement in the past, a very uncomfortable one now. The one who never seemed to care could not see the old house from her room, but it was there with her, so close that she could not think, so near that she could only feel, and she must feel everything that the old house had felt. The old house had been haunted so long, perhaps, that it had become a ghost itself.

In the old days she had often slept in the house of her friend, and had always liked to lie awake and think of the old house over there in her own house. Now they were all far away, except herself. The sad times in the old house had been very short in comparison with the long happy years, but the sad times had made the old house seem an unhappy place, and they had all gone and left it. They were happy now. Only the old house was unhappy with its windows dull, and a "Furnished Room" sign on the front door.

Tonight, however, it was not with the memories of the unhappy times that the old house tormented the one who never seemed to care. It was the happy times that the old house made so cruel with the reminder that they were gone and the suggestion that perhaps they never really existed. There was the memory of all the family, ten of them, at the table, of the daily drives with the children spilling out of the carriage, of the flowers that this one loved and the stray cats and dogs that another one cherished. There was the memory of books, old books and new books, babies' books and father's books, school books and novels, all a congenial crowd that never would stay on the library shelves. There was the memory of the kitchen where everybody learned to cook, and memories of dolls and horses and soap bubbles and popcorn and parties and Christmas trees and quarrels and punishments and everything that was a part of home. It was the surest thing in the world, that home, a place to come back to, a place to depend upon, a thing at last. The fear that troubled the one who never seemed to care was the possibility that perhaps it had not lasted after all. Away from the old house she knew better. She knew that the family is always happy, that it is just the way of families to grow and separate, that the happiness of those old days belongs to all the family today and that the home did last. The one who never seemed to care could have reasoned that out in the day time, or if she had been a few blocks farther away, but the old house would not let her reason. It was there just the same as it had always been and other things were different. It had been hurt and it wanted to hurt somebody else, poor old ghost of a house.

How He Was Caught.

He had no stomach for the army, but presented himself for examination with a "sure trick" up his sleeve to "work his ticket." He was physically perfect but his eyesight was shocking—so bad, indeed, that the sergeant thought the doctor should see him. "First class physically," pronounced the doctor, but when the medical man applied the eye tests the would-be recruit's sight appeared much worse than when the sergeant had him in hand. "No, no, my man; with sight like that you're no use for the army," said the medico. "But you ought to get glasses. Stay, I've a pair like microscopes, and if you see with them you can have them."

The spectacles were produced and fitted on, and the recruit at once cried, "Oh, I see splendidly!" "Do you now?" said the doctor, with sarcasm. "Take him along, sergeant, and get him sworn in. There's no glass in the spectacles."

A Pair of Pities.

Edith—Isn't it a pity that poor men don't know enough to remain single? Marie—Yes, and that rich ones do?

The Proverb Disproved.

He had returned from a day of observation at the bathing beach. "Figures will lie!" said he.

Juvenile Logis.

It was at a private entertainment and a lady had just risen from the piano.

"Would you like to be able to sing and play as I do, dear?"

"No, ma'am," was the unexpected reply.

"And why not?" asked the lady. "Cause," explained the small observer, "I wouldn't like to have people say such horrid things about me."
