"Sorrows come not singly."

Again the pale rider has passed our way. This time he has entered the home of Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Keeterson and taken their only daughter, Leona, who was the wife of Leslie Berke. Mrs. Berke spent most of her young life here in this community and was universally respected and loved by all who knew her. She always had a smile and a kindly word for everyone. Her untimely death is a terrible shock to the home circle and her many friends.

We would fain offer a few words of consolation to the grief stricken ones, but we realize how vain it is to gild a grief with words. "A group of heart broken friends, a hymn, a benediction, an open grave in the cemetery, a little mound of earth, and Leona is gone. She is at rest forever, but the world will still go on. The hearts of those who are left are wrung with grief and anguish. God bless them, God pity them. Time, and time alone, can heal their hearts. The years will come and go, now and then another, and still another, will follow her till naught but grassy mounds will mark how rapidly the years have gone. And thus it is that the wedding bells and the funeral chimes, the orange flowers and the immortelles, are so mingled together that half our tears break through our smiles and half our laughter is choked with sobs; and thus it is from the cradle to the grave, we laugh and cry, and sing and moan, while the world still goes on."
