The upper view shows how groups of big stumps are blasted out clean at one time, with all dirt off the roots and stumps shattered into kindling wood. At the same time the subsoil is thoroughly broken up, creating a fine home for the new crop. Lower view shows a celery crop worth $800 per acre ten months after stumps were blasted out.

In medieval times there was no such thing as a chimney piece. Previous to the twelfth century people warmed their houses by building open fires on a hearth in the center of their vast rooms or by lighting braziers; the smoke from these fires had to find its way out through a small hole in the roof.

One of the first sunrooms of which there is any record was in Madrid, at the home of Canovas del Castillo, prime minister during the regency. Dejeuner used to be served at one end of the conservatory, in the shadow of tall palms, while fountains played, birds with gay plumage sang, and the air was as fragrant as the tropics. For comfort, deep red rugs were put down on the white marble floors.

Piping, such as is made use of for conducting air, water, steam or hot water, is frequently buried in the wall, with nothing to indicate its presence, so that when repairs are necessary it is often a difficult matter to ascertain the location of these conduits. Very often this is accomplished only by tearing out the plaster and doing considerable damage to the property. A recently patented electric method for locating the pipes is simply a special application of the well-known induction balance principle. A convenient apparatus is made up, consisting of two sets of coils placed on ends of a magnet bar. One set of coils receives alternating or vibratory current from a suitable source, and the other coils are connected to a telephone. The balance is first established so that no sound is heard in the telephone. When the device comes near the metal piping this disturbs the balance and a sound is heard. It is thus an easy matter to find the exact position of the pipes and to reach them with less damage to the wall.

The Best Recommendation The strongest recommendation any article may receive is a favorable word from the user. It is the recommendations of those who have used it that makes Chamberlain's Cough Remedy so popular. Mrs. Amanda Gierhart, Waynesfield, Ohio, writes, "Chamberlain's Cough Remedy has been used in my family off and on for twenty years and it has never failed to cure a cough or cold."
