JERUSALEM, THE RISEN.

According to mediaeval cosmography, Jerusalem stood at the center of the inhabited earth, therefore at the center of the universe. And, despite the broadening of knowledge, the tradition survives. The civilized world was electrified by the news of the capture of Jerusalem by Christian forces.

Sacred city to the adherents of three religions, its passing into the hands of the people under whom all religions are respected, and by whom all worshippers are permitted freely to follow the dictates of their consciences, thrills almost all the Christian, the Jewish and the Mohammedan worlds.

To the Christian, the taking of Jerusalem seems almost like a dream. The crusaders who failed to reach the Holy Sepulchre, stir in their graves, and live again. Big, burly, generous Richard Coeur de Lion, who made his valiant entrance within sight of the Holy city on Christmas 1191, again shouts his battle cry, and priests, kings, knights, even the children, rally to it once more. They have slept for centuries. Their bones scattered across all Europe and on the sands of the desert have long since mingled with the earth. But today they seem to be with us in spirit, and like us, to gaze with wonder, and ask if it is really true that the Cross has replaced the Crescent in the Holy City.

They died disappointed, by countless thousands, because a power greater than theirs held Jerusalem. We have lived with only vague hope, not because of the power of the Turk, but because of the jealousies of the nations that perpetuated the weak Turk. The power of the Turk has gone, and his weakness no longer protects him, and at last, in very truth, the Holy Sepulchre has been taken from his keeping.

And the Jew exults with the Christian. No longer as a privileged guest need he humbly visit the city of his kings, his priests and his fathers. No longer does a brutal, hostile hand hold his sacred places. He knows that under the flag that floats over Jerusalem today there is all the freedom for him that there was for his race under the standards of David. Strange as it may seem, most of the Mohammedan world also joins in the triumph. The kaiser's appeal for a holy war, and its proclamation, only served to disclose the breach between the Turk and a great part of Mohammedanism. Arabia revolted and took the sacred city of Mecca from the Ottomans. Mohammedan soldiers joined with the British soldiers in the taking of another sacred city—Bagdad. And now, Mohammedans again have aided in the taking of the third and last of the great sacred centers of the adherents of the Prophet.

Apart from the military advantage of securing all this once Turkish territory anywhere near the Suez canal, and pressing northward toward a possible juncture with the forces operating from Bardad, we think this is the most telling feature of the fall of Jerusalem. It spells the end of Turkish power, even over peoples of like faith the Turk has dreamed of revived importance in alliance with the German. An invincible Teuton-Turkish empire was to hold the keys of the World. And Mecca, Bagdad and Jerusalem have been wrenched from his grip. Of these, Jerusalem has for centuries stood as the symbol of Turkey's successful defiance of the world. Its loss must chill the Turk to the marrow, as its gain thrill us. He could not hold his shrine, nor could his German overlord prevent his losing it. And he has lost it because a large part of the Mohammedan world is against him.

THE OPEN FIREPLACE.

This world would be pleasanter were not fancy and romance so continually clashing with efficiency. Pretty or pleasant things are usually, by some apparently immutable law of nature, wasteful things, or for other reason things not to be made or seen. For years an open fireplace has been regarded as one of the proper accompaniments of romance. Young people in planning their bungalow usually provide for an open fireplace; others, not young, look back pleasantly upon the time when the entire house was heated by an open fire, and wish that those days could be recalled. An open fireplace pleases the eye and stirs the fancies. Why it should be not clear, but that it does, plays, stories and pictures without number will testify. So it is not surprising that the open fireplace should be banned as wasteful.

Open grates are also wasteful of fuel, as well as the larger open fireplaces, and if they are wasteful they must also be abolished. This is the only patriotic conclusion, but it is, nevertheless, a painful one. Watching the flickering blaze of an open fire can no longer be pleasant because it is unpatriotic. That the fireplace would eventually be condemned was inevitable. Its abolishment will be taken in the spirit of sacrificing service. But there can be no harm in expressing regret that it must be so.

Of course, Seattle's new mayor will promise that there will be no lifting of the lid. But after things cool down the lid may be pried up a little so that visitors may take a peep underneath. That is the "Seattle spirit."

The little girl with the crepe de chine taste, who made the mistake of having for her daddy a man with a cheese cloth income, can explain that she is camouflaging so that we may win the war.

The government is going to be mighty nice about those income tax payments. It will help you in every way it can except to furnish the money.

From a news note: "The burglar left untouched a full quart of whisky." Maybe the scoundrel is trying to make burglary popular.

It is beginning to look as if there's nothing else to it. The snow shovel's gotta go over the top again before February.

Food pirates might be headed off by applying the punishment traditionally meted out to pirates.

WASTED WATER POWER.

It is no disparagement of the vitally important war program to say that one of the first duties of congress at this session is to enact legislation which shall release for the public benefit the millions of undeveloped horse-power of the streams of this country. This legislation may properly be considered as a war measure; for the annoying fuel shortage in many parts of the country is unquestionably much accentuated, if not actually produced by war conditions—and it is mainly for the relief of the fuel situation that the country now demands the development of that hydro-electric power which is locked up in the potential energy of our idle rivers.

The northwest is more fortunate in respect to the use of its water power than any other part of the United States. Were it not for the electricity furnished by such power we of this state would be going "lightless" two days in each week. Such is the situation where coal is used for creating light. At this time of great need for the acceleration of manufactures the nation finds itself with nearly 55,000,000 horse power going to waste and with only 5,000,000 in actual use.

This is not due to any lack of enterprise or capital for the development of the power. The sources of such power were tied up by congress, and it will take congressional action to untie the knot. The result of the action taken by congress is that the public derives no practical benefit whatever from its undeveloped water powers, and is in serious industrial straits, today, because of the short-sighted policy which has prevented the leasing of those power privileges, under due governmental restrictions, to private enterprises which are eager and able to turn them to genuine service.

Experts agree that enough water power could be put to use in various parts of the nation to replace about 25 per cent of the coal now used. Conservation of coal is, as everybody knows, one of the intricate problems now confronting the American people where other fuel is not easily attainable. The shortage of fuel is due not to any increase in the number of consumers, but, rather, to the difficulties of transportation. The trouble is, in other words, not so much a coal shortage as a car shortage; but the effect is the same. Some important industries in the east are actually at the point of suspending operations because coal is not forthcoming in quantities sufficient to maintain power for the running of their machinery. Water power attends to its own transportation, without cost. The more water power employed in running industrial plants, the more coal and cars available for other purposes.

A clothes limit has been put on in Germany and a man is not permitted to have more than three shirts, and everything must be purchased by card. In this country, the card system is not needed, so effective is the price-hoarding system.

The doctors are warning young people of the contagion that lurks in the under-the-mistletoe kisses. Now if we hear of a whole lot of sickness we will lay it to the kisses and not to an over-indulgence of good things.

Just at the present time Gresham is facing a scarcity of pumpkin pie—all because the Food Huns have boosted the prices of the other ingredients so that the pie foundries are backward about using the pumpkin crop.

If the Food Huns could have their way the poor old pocketbook would notice little difference between meeting a mere holiday surcharge and taking care of a mere increase in price.

It is not our intention to write a history of the matrimonial events of the holidays, but from present indications the girls are the ones who are getting married while the widows are as plentiful as ever.

It begins to look like that the bolshevik will not be in business much longer. And when the rat-killing begins, the real patriots of Russia ought to exterminate everyone of them.

Those spruce forests of Oregon will develop into an aerial squadron that will keep the Germans up in the air while driving them into a hole.

There are going to be some New Year resolutions of an important nature that will have to be kept this time.

Get a little thrift stamp, then get more and watch them grow.

HERBERT C. HOOVER SAYS RAISE LAMBS

"Plan now for the maximum production of spring lambs," urges Assistant Federal Food Administrator W. K. Newell, who calls attention to the recent announcement made by the Meat Department of the United States Food Administration, that there are now no restrictions upon the sale and consumption of lamb except the regular Meatless Day restrictions to which beef and pork are also subject.

"Farmers and sheep men should breed now for a full production of lambs next spring," said Mr. Newell, the fullest possible meat supply will be needed, and a big lamb crop will go a long way towards reducing the home consumption of beef and pork. The market will inevitably be good and steady so that a fair profit is assured. Let every one plan for a maximum lamb crop now. Lambs will be a good business investment; the investor will also be helping out substantially in the solution of the nation's food problems.

Within twelve hours after receiving news of the Halifax disaster the woman's committee of the Council of National Defense had equipped a relief steamer and started it to the scene of the disaster.
