Christmastide

"It came upon the midnight clear,
That glorious song of old,
From angels bending near the earth
To touch their harps of gold;
'Peace on the earth, good-will to men,'
From heaven's all-gracious King,
The world in solemn stillness lay
To hear the angels sing."

The peace of God and the joy of Christmastide to everyone, from REV. EARL B. COTTON.

THE CARTOONIST AND THE WAR

We are all ready to admit that the cartoons in our newspapers and magazines have played a large part in arousing and shaping public sentiment in connection with the war. This is especially true of our American cartoonists. Their work has been most effective.

A little magazine that comes to the Outlook office is called "Pep." In it this subject is discussed by T. C. O'Donnell, as follows:

"The American cartoonist never had to be mobilized. He mobilized himself, 'way back in August, 1911. It was then he became an ally of the entente nations. From the start he saw the big issues at stake with an astonishing clearness.

"When many even of our statesmen were floundering about in the dark, unable to discover where America's duty and interest lay; when a lot of folks were counseling neutrality and a suspension of judgment till the thing was over and we could see it from a distance; when editors, a great many of them, were writing dispassionate articles about the possibility of both sides being half wrong and half right, the cartoonist saw the villainy of the Berlin outfit and declared war to the hilt.

"To the cartoonist the kaiser and his crew became Huns with the first Belgian child impaled upon a German spear. They were not Germans; they were not Teutons; they were just plain, every-day Huns, savages, boches, fiends let loose from hell. The cartoonist set himself to a task in black and white; he used no wash, no half-tones, no ben-day screens to soften the effect.

"The vividness with which the war early impressed itself upon the minds of American cartoonists is the more remarkable in view of the fact that the conflict was, if the quotation is not banal, 'three thousand miles away.'" French and British artists rose to the occasion, of course—men like Partridge, Raven-Hill and Poulbot in Paris. They could hear the roar of the artillery and see the wounded returning; they knew of the zeppelin raids from frequent personal experiences; many of them got to the front. Yet so vividly did our own cartoonists react, even at a distance, against the German idea of war that their work will bear comparison, not only in workmanship, but in conception and savageness of satire with the best work done abroad.

"From the start the public educational value of the American cartoonists' work was immeasurable. People who were not in the habit of reading the editorial page got on the front page a red-hot editorial in pictorial form. There is scarcely a daily all-American newspaper in the country that, either through a staff cartoonist or a syndicate service, did not present to its readers at least one anti-German cartoon a day. Even the cartoonists on the sporting page, all praise to them, got into the game and took a frequent crack at that rummiest of all sports, the Hun.

"The result of all this propaganda—combined, of course, with the influence of the editorial and other agencies—was that in spirit the American people were at war with Germany months before war was actually declared. And now, with America in deep, our cartoonists are throwing their talent into every movement that will in any way contribute to victory. Their response to the dozen and one calls made upon their pens by this and that patriotic endeavor has been one of the fine things of our participation in the war.

"The cartoonist's mail is filled with requests from committees to draw Red Cross cartoons and thrift stamp cartoons, smokes cartoons and ship-building cartoons and war relief cartoons, and on through a long list. To a man they have come through, not only contributing cartoons to their own papers, but also giving freely of their time and talent for posters and circulars for a more general circulation."

Married men and these 45-53-year-old bachelors are going to wonder at the great change that has come over their young women friends after "the boys come home."
