READY FOR NEW WORK.

It would be absurd to say or think that the war had transformed the agriculture of Oregon or any other state. Nothing could be farther from the truth. In the first place, our agriculture is not fully transformed as yet, and secondly, the war was only a contributing factor in the accomplishment of what has been done.

For years there has been an almost silent process at work, an influence making for transformation, emanating from our agricultural college, working through various channels. It is slow at times, but for the most part it works quietly, and almost imperceptibly. At times some individual springs up and undertakes to perform by an act what must necessarily be the work of a whole generation of men, perhaps more, but its subsidence is as swift as the appearance, and the process continues.

The war accelerated things. It brought a manifold stimulus to the aid of the men who have wrought for years upon this problem, educationally, patriotically emotional and practical stimulus that, spurred to immediate, organized activity, and probably effected results that would have required years to achieve otherwise. Nevertheless, the work of recent years, centering in the O. A. C., provided a background and jumping-off place for the agricultural undertakings of the war. Now it becomes the work of the college and the county agriculturists to move forward from the new ground gained.

Not all the home work of the war was merely "staging" to be torn down when the war was over. Not all of it made for destruction with a view to peace. A deal of it was constructive in the fullest sense of the word. We have made shells to be blown into atoms, but we have also made ships to sail the seven seas for years to come. And we have increased acreage, developed long neglected crop possibilities, interested many young men in farming, got new insight into the values of cooperative endeavor, and in many ways laid tier on tier of constructive work upon the foundations established in years of patient and often discouraging toil.

Here there has been no war waste. We are not now engaged in salvaging something out of a wreck. Our agricultural gain in the war is all gain. It is off a piece with the work we were doing before the war. We can go straight on from it to new work of the same kind.

The Canby News is the first of our country exchanges to reach us in holiday dress. It is an edition of twelve pages, well filled with Christmas matter and well patronized by advertisers.

What has become of the fellow who said many Americans liked France so well that they would stay there after the war?

FULL SPEED AHEAD.

There is one big American industry that isn't facing contract cancellations, plant reorganization and labor readjustment. Food production must be maintained at high levels in this country for years to come, and the farmer has got his hands full to keep up with the demands that will be made upon him. Vigorous food conservation campaigns will do something towards making what we can raise "go around," enforced food regulations will add a bit to reserve, and overseas organizations will help, but the key to the whole situation is big production, and while awake nights, evolving schemes for the readjustment of the manufacturing industries, the word to the food production industry is "Full Speed Ahead."

The next few years are full of promise for the American farmer. Indeed, it is difficult to see anything like a violent dislocation of the food production industry ahead. In the course of time, the great Argentinian, Australian and Russian resources will be poured into the world's larder again, but this is primarily a matter of tonnage, at least in regard to the antipodes, and the tonnage production problem is not to be solved in a day. Eventually, too, the stomach of Europe and no small part of Asia will be filled, and its pantry will be replenished, but that, too, is a long job. And the ending of it will not be a sudden cut-off, but a process. Meanwhile there is a big hole to fill, and a big pile of reserve stocks to be reared on top of it, and the job is up to the American farmer, be he big or be he little in respect of his operations.

And there will be substantial returns for his effort. It isn't comfortable for the city dweller to contemplate the continued high cost of necessities, but here the law of supply and demand will operate in spite of us. Even our artificial devices to nullify it are tacit recognitions of its universality and inexorableness. The world, pretty much the whole of it, needs food—more food than there is in stock or in sight—and it must end with pay for it.

By the way, there is a point here that ought not to be overlooked. Somehow, this notion has got into certain heads that America has become a sort of a free food dispensary. Nothing could be farther from the truth. With all our idealism, we are not giving away food. What is given away at the further end of the process is paid for by somebody somewhere in the process.

Germany is to have something to eat, when she needs it, or after the allied countries and the neutrals have been supplied, but Germany will pay, and she won't pay in her wartime paper.

But the point is that there will be a market for everything the farmer can get to market, and this is a thing to keep in mind in our own state in the coming months when the farm bureau men are in the field preparing for the coming year's work.

Just to show our optimism in humanity we are willing to subscribe to the affirmation that 95 per cent of the men who try the great swear-off experiment this time will remain alive. It used to be pretty hard to keep a seat on the water wagon but now it's going to be easy to stay on.

When we think of the matchless gallantry of the Dixie boys who fought so wonderfully side by side with the northern sons, it makes us feel proud that we were able to lick their fathers in that great struggle of more than half a century ago.

Somebody says that very few successful women marry. But you can't make a married man believe that the woman who married him wasn't successful.

For All Our Heroic Dead

Some died where their soul-quests sent them, on fields of their hearts' desire,
Where the God of a Thousand Battles smote loud on his brazen lyre.
With their young blood racing madly, with their young eyes hot as flame,
With the roar in their eager ears of those who strove in the Iron Game.
With the sound of the guns about them, with the scream of the shells on high,
With the powder-sting in their nostrils and their comrades charging by,
And their blood-flecked lips smiled sweetly and whispered a wondrous thing!
"Oh, Grave, where is thy victory; Oh, Death, where is thy sting?"

Some died while their feet were halted ere pressed to a foreign soil,
With their cherished goal far distant, 'midst a drab camp's humdrum toil,
Died with the glamour wanting, with the years that they'd lived too few,
With a hunger all unsated, with a dream not yet come true.
With not e'en the home familiars, nor a loved one's tender care,
With bodies that here had being but with hearts that were "Over There."
With denied unto them the knowledge, unknown the Ages' call:
Though the mills of the gods grind slowly, they grind exceeding small!"

L' Envoy.
And so, when a Nation mourneth,
When the Eagle bows his head,
Let our prayers ascend, world without end,
For all—our Heroic Dead!

—CAPTAIN ROBERT D. NEWHALL, in Straight Grain.

Secretary Houston says the farmers this year produced $12,272,000,000 worth of eatables in the United States—that being the farmers' price. Trade reports will show nearly forty billions. Figure it out and name the profiteer.
