State Leader Resigns.

Plans for draining and restoring to use of more than 150,000 acres of rich overflow lands in Western Oregon are outlined in a new bulletin by W. L. Powers, chief in soils. These lands now more or less flooded, comprise tide lands, overflow bottoms and beaver dam marshes. At the rate of one family to each 40 acres a total of 3750 families could find homes and livelihoods on these reclaimed lands. So fertile are the lands that it is estimated they would support one cow to each acre.

Underground tile supplemented by protective dikes where needed is the general recommendation. Average costs are estimated at $25 an acre.

Large areas are best handled by community operations with organization under the splendid drainage laws of Oregon. All operations should be undertaken only after engineering surveys have been made. The College extension service will help communities get started. Arrangements should provide for payment of drainage taxes in installments.

The importance of reclaiming the lands to add to the resources of the state, to supply homes to returning soldiers and other land hungry folk and to give employment to surplus labor, are indicated in the bulletin, free copies of which may be had on request at the College.

Insurance Company Sued.

The following paragraph from the Oregonian concerns local people:

With the aim of collecting $1500 fire insurance money on a policy which was never issued, Carrie Salquist is suing the Oregon Fire Relief association in the court of Circuit Judge Gantenben. The plaintiff held a policy in the company which expired January 27, 1918. Her home burned March 31, 1918. The basis of the suit lies on a telephone conversation with John Brown, former agent of the fire insurance company. On November 15, 1917, Mrs. Salquist alleges she telephoned Brown that her policy was expiring in January and that she wanted to have it renewed at that time. He said he would attend to it, but before January he left the firm and no renewal went into effect. The case was on-sued by Judge Gantenben.

A TRUE GOOSE STORY FOR OUTLOOK BOYS

At Mt. Vernon, Illinois, 75 miles east and south of St. Louis, where the writer once lived, was a saloon at the edge of the town, called "The Last Chance!" A mile or so on down the road beyond the saloon, lived a man with his wife and three or four children, a confirmed inebriate. Each day and every day, this man might be found hanging about that saloon, leaving home in the morning, and returning usually about dark, famished for food, his wife and children being in much the same condition, for they were poor, with nothing to buy flour, meat, sugar, coffee, anything else. Their condition was such as to excite sympathy and pity.

They had, however, a small flock of geese, among which was a pet gander that followed his master every morning to that saloon, remaining patiently all day about the place, living on the grain that fell from farm wagons that stopped, as many of them did, at the saloon. These farmers, not infrequently, asked the gander's owner to have a drink. It was for this purpose that he sat from morning till night every day of his life in that dram shop attended just outside the front door by the gander.

Once on the way home as it was getting dark, with the gander toddling along at the heels of his master, a fox stole up behind, made a grab, pulling a bunch of feathers out of the gander's tail. Next morning he had to be coaxed quite a bit to go.

On a certain day, at the saloon, a bunch of men drinking and carrying on, caught the gander, pouring down his throat a quantity of whiskey which soon began to take effect.

The poor bird flopped his wings, screamed, tried to fly, rushed at objects with the butts of wings, falling over finally—dead drunk.

The whole afternoon he lay, helpless and limp, his master at night carrying him home in his arms, with wings and head hanging down as if he were dead.

Next morning he refused to follow though his master called and coaxed him to do so. Never again did he go near that saloon.

OLD THIRD OREGON IN U. S. AGAIN

Following quickly the rousing welcome home we accorded our boys of the 65th Artillery, comes the news of the landing of the old 3d Oregon, now a part of 162d Infantry, under command of Col. J. L. May, in New York on Wednesday morning. Comes also the good word that our heroes are in such superb form that it is unlikely that they will be detained in camp for any length of time. There are four hundred of them, enough of a unit to send along in a train of their own. So we must be ready to welcome them soon.

Many local boys left home with the good old 3d, but the regiment was so scattered upon reaching France that there is no way of telling how many of them are still under the command of their idolized colonel.

Colonel May himself sends on word that the men are eager to return to their homes and to the old Oregon National Guard. The men saw plenty of action abroad. Several have been cited for deeds of conspicuous gallantry. One hundred and twenty of them were commissioned from the ranks, and many more were just out of officers school awaiting their commissions when the armistice was signed. There has been no whimpering from them.

There is a prospect of their return home within a fortnight.
