DO WE WANT THEM?

The publicity, directly and indirectly, being given our union high school in various papers of the state, and the recommendation that the city schools adopt courses in agriculture and mechanics, presages a larger attendance here next year.

Many have thought Principal Goodwin's predictions of attendance for the future a little large, but all indications are that they are well founded.

It is a growing conviction with those in a position to know the facts that the Union High School may have if the district wants them, an enrollment of 500 students in the next four or five years.

IF the locality and district want them badly enough. That's a big "if" but it is not unobtainable.

The first question is, is it worth while? Let every man and woman who values at all the advantages of his or her home or business locality and the benefits to the youth of an education, say, "YES."

The next question is, "Do we want it badly enough to make whatever sacrifice it will require?"

That is not so easy to answer. Each one must carefully consider. A little study of relative values, a determination of what life means, what wealth means, of what health and home mean will lead to the conviction that whatever sacrifice it requires will become one of life's great joys and lead to the wide-spreading benefits.

The next question is, "Should we not take steps right away to provide what will be needed in the very near future?"

It takes time to formulate plans and provide funds and get work done.

The Outlook is certain this is the most urgent matter calling for support and action in this locality right now. This is the great issue here and now. We ought not to let a nyother thing overshadow it or delay it. It is time to start something definite.

TOO NARROW A POLICY.

The recent action of the council in limiting the use of the new motor fire truck to local territory, is either a joke or it is too serious to be a joke.

The Outlook was asked to announce that if property owners outside the limits, within a reasonable distance, would help the town pay for new equipment they could be assured the town would permit the department to respond in cases of fire.

This seemed to meet with approbation and we are told responses were coming in.

Now the council limits the use of the fire truck to the city.

This is an action that ought to be rescinded and for several good reasons.

As it is true "no man liveth to himself," so it is true no town can adopt a narrow policy in regard to extending its benefits to its neighbors, especially in cases of emer-

Children's Story THE STORY THE DEWDROPS TOLD

(Written for the United States Garden Army, Department of the Interior).

DOLLY MEETS "THE TANK." "But I AM afraid of them," said Dolly. She made "am" very strong.

"Why should you be afraid of them?" asked the Queen of the Dew-drop Fairies. "They are so ugly, and they look like SNAKES," answered Dolly.

"If you look carefully at their spotted skins you will see that the colors are really quite beautiful—soft shades of grey and pale yellow and sage green—quite fashionable colors, some of them," said the Fairy.

"I don't care, they look like snakes, and I wouldn't touch one for anything in the world."

"You don't have to touch one—you can just look at him and see what a help he is in the garden. He is one of the best helpers of the United States School Garden Army."

"I don't see how anything so horrid looking can help—unless he scares the enemies to death," said the little girl, rather stubbornly.

"If you will come with me down to the end of the garden where the cabbages grow," said the Fairy, "maybe I can show you something that will make you change your mind."

She spread her beautiful wings and floated along through the air. Dolly's fat little legs had hard work to keep up with her. At the far end of the garden was a patch of cabbages—quite fine looking, most of them were, but one or two did not look so well.

"Now," said the Fairy, "stoop down and take a good look under the leaves."

Dolly did as she was bid but saw nothing at all. "I don't see anything," she said.

"Look in the dirt close under the cabbages," said the Fairy.

Dolly stooped down and peered under the cabbage leaves again. All at once something twinkled at her. She jumped. It was an eye. Then she saw a flat head that did look something like a snake. The mouth seemed to divide the head in two, it went so far around. And right under the mouth Dolly could see a funny trembling in the throat.

"What is it?" she cried; "it's a toad." "Why couldn't you see it before?" said the Fairy.

"It's almost buried in the ground. And the part of it that is outside looks like an old leaf—or something."

gency, and every fire is a case of emergency.

When a big fire occurred some years ago in Gresham the Portland fire department responded and rendered efficient help. In any case the willingness was appreciated and the town thanked the Portland department for assistance. Recently when a fire threatened the business portion of Oregon City the Portland department responded generously.

The old saying is if you have had a kindness shown pass it on. This is the generous and reasonable thing to do and Gresham cannot afford to be narrow in the use of its fine fire equipment.

There are many deeper and better reasons than mere business policy but on that ground alone the town can well afford to make it permanently certain that help will be rendered within the accessible radius of this part of the county in case of need.

The efficiency of the equipment depends on the fire boys. They pledge themselves without financial reward and with prospect of loss and injury to do all they can to protect the property and people of the town. They have freely given a considerable fund toward the new motor fire truck. They are willing and anxious to respond in case of necessity to calls from the surrounding country. To not be permitted to do this dampens their enthusiasm and checks their interest.

Those outside are not likely to ask for this service; it may be more than they expect. They should have it, however, and it will be to the interests of Gresham to extend it to them.

Our wool's milk produce mackinaw and other cloth, ship it to many parts of the country to clothing manufacturers, who resell it to Oregon retail merchants, who might have purchased here in the first instance.

"That's 'camouflage,'" said the Fairy. "Cammy—who?" asked Dolly. She thought it was a name.

"It is a long, French word," explained the Fairy. "It means to disguise things so you can't tell what they are. Did you ever listen to Fatherbob reading the papers,—about the soldiers fighting over in France?"

"Oh, yes! My cousin Jack was over there a long time, and he wrote the most inter-esting letters. Why?"

"Do you remember anything he read you about the 'Tanks'?" said the fairy. "Of course I do—and I've seen pictures of them too."

"Well, the tanks—and sometimes the big guns too—were hidden by either painting them to look like earth and trees or covering them with real brush and branches. What you see on the Toad's back is just that. He is colored like the dirt and the leaves so the enemies won't see him. Then he can catch them."

"But what can he catch—ow!" The last little squeal was caused by a sudden movement that Dolly had not been expecting. A small fly had been sitting on the cabbage leaf. Without moving at all the toad shot out a long, slender tongue. And suddenly, there was no small fly sitting on the cabbage leaf.

"Watch him just a minute," advised the Fairy. "Look on the under side of the leaf."

Dolly looked and saw a number of small green creatures sticking to the cabbage leaf. As she looked, the toad's long tongue darted out and quite a space on the leaf was swept clean of the insects.

"What are those things?" she asked. "Those are aphids," said the Fairy; "they suck the life out of cabbage. Mr. Toad, you see, makes quick work of them. His tongue is sticky and once it touches them it is all over. They are a great pest, and the toad—whom you dislike so much—is a wonderful help in keeping them—and other insects—away."

"Well—I'm glad he's useful," said Dolly, "because I really do not think he is pretty."
