After middle age, the Threaded Rubber Insulation Battery still maintains its capacity. Wood insulation batteries gradually lose capacity due to partial short circuits through the wood—called "electrical leakage." This makes frequent recharging necessary and the owner has expense for both recharging and use of rent battery. By keeping the plates perfectly insulated from each other, rapid plate wear from partial short circuits is avoided, and under the same conditions of care and use the Threaded Rubber Insulation battery gives more months of service.

The Threaded Rubber Insulation battery gives much greater assurance of uninterrupted service, reducing to a minimum the possibility of battery failure on the road.

168 car manufacturers are using Willard Batteries with Threaded Rubber Insulation as regular equipment.
