RIGHT CANNING PROCESS WILL KEEP SWEET CIDER

Sweet cider may be canned so as to keep its natural flavor and aroma indefinitely, by a method worked out at the hort products laboratory of the Oregon Agricultural college experiment station. The cooked jelly taste is entirely absent.

The apples are collected, sorted to all sound ones, and then cleaned and piled up to sweat, which develops an exquisite aroma in the skins. The sound fruits only are then ground up with a grater. Spoiled fruits spoil the flavor and render the juice watery.

With hydraulic presses an average of three gallons from each bushel of fruit is obtained. The juice is pumped directly from the press into a receiving tank and strained through a coarse cloth or burlap to remove pulp. It is then run through a centrifuge of the type used in clarifying milk.

The juice is then put into the sterilizer, which may be a black tin or copper coil in a tank of water which is to be held at an even temperature of 160, Fahrenheit. Good thermometers and careful watching are essential.

The product next goes into sterilized plain tins which are sealed at once and processed at 160 degrees—no more—for 30 minutes or more. Time is counted after tank thermometer records 160, which must not be exceeded. After a short period of cooling, the cans are ready for market or storage.

If sterilizing the juice causes too much air in it, the cans are run thru an exhaust box at 160 for about five minutes.
