U. S. VETERANS' BUREAU REPRESENTATIVE HERE

For the purpose of ascertaining all grievances relative to war service and all claims for compensation by war veterans of this town and vicinity, Zack L. Taylor, special contact representative of the United States veterans' bureau, will be in Gresham, July 24, and personally interview former service men.

Despite that fact that the war ended more than three years ago, there are still many veterans entitled to assistance of the government offered disabled former service men who have failed to make proper application for it, according to Mr. Taylor.

"If a veteran believes that he has a just claim against the government for injuries or other disabilities due to war service, now is the time for him to present his claim to the veterans' bureau. If the former service man is not satisfied with the amount of his present compensation he should take the matter up with me during my visit there. Even though the disability may not be compensable under the present federal laws, filing a claim will protect him in case his trouble becomes aggravated after August 9. The war veteran who believes that his experience during service has caused a vocational handicap in the carrying on of his prewar occupation should make proper claim for vocational training at the expense of the government. The veterans' bureau is eager to have all claims against the government in Oregon cleaned up this spring and summer."

Veterans of the World War who need hospitalization or medical care of any kind should get in touch with Mr. Taylor upon his arrival here. It is Mr. Taylor's plan to make his headquarters at Attorney Schneider's office in the Withrow building, Gresham.

The work of the veterans' bureau for the benefit of disabled service men is increasing rapidly, according to officials of this government agency. There are more than 900 veterans confined in hospitals in Idaho, Washington and Oregon. The government at this time is paying directly into the hands of disabled war veterans of the Pacific Northwest district more than $600,000 a month in compensation and vocational training allowances. There are 3400 former service men of this district taking vocational training under the veterans' bureau to become rehabilitated and approximately 6,000 others are being paid straight compensation because of their disabilities.

Regular meeting of Gresham Lodge No. 125, I. O. O. F. in the Odd Fellows hall, every Thursday evening. Brothers welcome. CLARENCE STANLEY, N. G. C. A. HILL, Secretary.

Compensation for veterans ranges from $8 to $100 a month while vocational trainees receive $80 or $100 a month during process of rehabilitation. Additional pay is added for dependents. The veteran must prove his disability directly due to war service.

Mr. Taylor will also take care of matters relative to government insurance during his stay here, it was announced. More than 7,000 veterans of Oregon are carrying government insurance. The time for reinstating war risk insurance was recently extended to March 6, 1926. Announcement has been made that the 1922 dividend to insured veterans will total $1,750,000.
