She reported the loss at once to the police and was told to go to the station in the morning. On the way, driving over the Foster road, the lost car was discovered at the side of the road. About three gallons of gas had been used, otherwise nothing was missing.

A Questionable Remedy.

Compulsory automobile insurance is proposed to reduce automobile accidents and to recompense those who have received injury or lost life through the fault of operators of automobiles who are financially irresponsible and unable to pay money damage.

A survey of automobile accidents in the city of Cleveland shows that in only 39 per cent of cases investigated were automobile drivers held to blame for accidents.

Using this example as a basis for figuring, Edward C. Stone, of the Employers Liability Assurance corporation, applies it to a state like Massachusetts, which has about four million population. He makes his comparisons from official figures as to accidents, insured cars, and financially responsible drivers.

The startling conclusion which he shows is that this supposedly remedial legislation would be saddled upon all automobile owners to compel them to do certain things because of the irresponsible action of some 3000 persons in a state like Massachusetts, where there are some 700,000 automobile operators.

Would a compulsory insurance law tend to create carelessness on the part of a careless or irresponsible person?

It would probably have just the opposite effect, by relieving such drivers of all possible responsibility. Such a compulsory law would undoubtedly build up an enormous political machine to administer it under a state fund.

The thing most essential today is to reduce the number of accidents, and not to make it easier to have an accident at the expense of somebody else.
