NAN'S BURGLAR
By GLADYS P. ANDERSON.

In front of Nan Gray's house roared and surged the great Atlantic. The waves floating an occasional fishing vessel were all that passed before her windows. Nan was not an old woman, somewhere between twenty-eight and thirty. She lived alone and kept the old house in good order. Always on Saturdays she drove to the village three miles away for groceries; on Sundays she drove as regularly to church. These simple excursions were all that brightened her life.

There was only one other house near hers, the Hansons', and they had been on unfriendly terms for years. Once the son, Dick Hanson, had paid attention to Nan and Dick's mother had interfered and broken off the engagement.

There wasn't a prettier girl at Rocky Coast than Nan Gray; still she had never married since Dick Hanson left town.

There were times as the years went on that she longed for him to come again. She was often afraid alone in her house, especially in the winter time. She confessed her fears to no one, hardly to herself.

"What good does it do to be afraid? I've got to live alone and there's no way out of it," she said.

Nan had heaped her stove with the last of her wood, but she feared it would burn out before morning. There was no water in the house and no path to the well. A sense of utter loneliness smote her as she sat alone that evening listening to the roaring of the wind and the breaking of the waves. At eight o'clock she went upstairs to bed. It was a long time before she went to sleep; then she slept soundly for a few hours. It was perhaps four o'clock when she awoke with a deadly terror.

There was someone in the house. She lay still, listening fearfully. She heard movements soft and guarded. Later on she heard the pump out in the yard, which had a peculiar creak. Presently the first cold glimmer of dawn was in the room and she heard a door shut below—then everything was still. She thought of her mother's silver teaspoons and the gold watch which had belonged to her father. Of course they were gone. But when she reached the kitchen she gasped and stared.

A bright fire was burning in the stove and the room was full of the aroma of coffee. A pan of warm biscuits sat on the stove.

In the frying pan was a bit of beefsteak all ready to cook.

The water pail was full of fresh water, and the woodbox was piled high with dry wood. Outside the storm was raging, but the kitchen seemed like a little oasis of warmth and comfort in the midst of it.

Nan tried to think who had done it, but she was entirely at a loss. She ate suspiciously, almost as if she thought the food might be poisoned. The next night Nan retired early, to awaken as she had done the night before, at sounds below. She got out of bed, and throwing her kimono hastily about her, she groped her way to an old-fashioned chest which had belonged to her father, and drew forth an old rusty revolver. "It may do to scare them away," Nan thought, as she started down stairs. When she opened the kitchen door, her face was ghastly.

The fire was burning, and the teakettle boiling.

She had only a vision of a figure darting swiftly into the pantry. Nan sprang to the pantry door and drew the bolt. A cold shiver ran over her. "Who are you?" she finally asked.

There was no response. Then she spoke again, "Who are you?"

"Can't you guess, Nan?" came a feeble voice from the pantry.

She hurriedly unbolted the pantry door.

"In heaven's name, what are you doing here?" she demanded, dropping the revolver to the floor.

Dick Hanson, emerging from the pantry, looked at once shame-faced and self-assertive.

"Wait Nan, until I explain. Mother thought of you over here all alone in this terrible storm and she couldn't stand it. I just came home last night. I thought you might be in need of wood, so I came over early. How neat everything is here," he went on, his voice gathering firmness in spite of his agitation, which made him tremble from head to foot.

"Where have you been all these years, Dick?" Nan asked.

"All over the world, Nan. I enlisted in the navy when I left home," Dick approached Nan and put his arm around her.

"Haven't you been afraid here all alone?" he asked.

"Yes, I have; but I didn't think you cared."

"I did," he answered. "You're not going to be left here alone any longer, Nan."

Then the door opened and Mrs. Hanson looked in. Dick's face showed over Nan's shoulder.

"Bless you, my children," said the old lady, her face beaming with friendliness, and it was suddenly borne in upon the consciousness of Nan Gray that love and kindness were not such strangers at Rocky Coast as she had thought.
