AIR-TIGHT WALL IS NEEDED

In Building a Silo Protection Must Be Provided for Silage to Prevent Molding.

It makes little difference what material is used in building a silo as long as the silo is practically air tight all around the walls and bottom. Wood, cement, tile, iron, and plaster silos have been used with success. Protection against mold is largely dependent upon the exclusion of air, and for this purpose an air-tight wall is required and the ensiled material should be properly packed in the silo. Silage will keep equally well in any one of the silos mentioned provided the walls are properly made, are air and moisture tight, and the material is correctly ensiled.

REINFORCING INSIDE OF SILO

Where High Winds Prevail It is Good Insurance to Place Wood Hoops at Top and Bottom.

Where high winds prevail it is good insurance to reinforce the inside of a stave silo with wood hoops at the top and bottom. Pieces of thin, narrow lumber, usually weather boarding, are nailed to the staves so as to form a hoop of 4 to 5 thicknesses of the weather-boarding, care being exercised to break joints. The strips are 8x10 feet long and they may be soaked in water so as to bend easier.

CAPACITY OF COW'S STOMACH

Not Enough Nutrition in Pasture Grass to Make Maximum Production of Milk.

The bulky nature of pasture grass places a positive limit upon the capacity of the cow to take feed. In other words, the cow's stomach cannot contain grass enough to supply the required nutrients for maximum milk production; therefore a part of the ration should be of a more concentrated nature. Good pasture contains an abundant supply of succulent palatable and nutritious grasses.
