POULTRY

RUNTY HENS NOT DESIRABLE

Investigation Shows at Least One Fowl in Fifteen is Undersized and Hence Unprofitable.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.) Runtiness is not so conspicuous in the poultry flock as it is among other farm animals, yet it is a factor to be considered, and it is possible that in some cases it is of great importance.

Good Feeding and Care Will Practically Eliminate Runtiness.

tion of runts and their remedy conducted by the United States Department of Agriculture. The information was obtained from nearly 1,000 farmers to whom questionnaires were sent. Although these farmers were considered to be better than the average, they reported that 7 per cent of their animals were undersized to such a degree as to be called runty.

Inbreeding and poor matings, as a cause, are the principal factors distinguishing runtiness in feathered stock from that in other farm animals. It is the consensus of opinion of 471 poultry owners, in all parts of the country, that the following causes are chiefly responsible for the runts found in feathered flocks:

Table with 2 columns: Cause and Per cent. Includes Poor feeding (17.3%), Inbreeding and poor matings (13.7%), Interior breeding stock (13.1%), Parasites, especially lice (12.4%), Neglect (11.4%), Poor housing (7.6%), Late hatching (6.8%), Overcrowding (6.5%), Disease (roup, diarrhea, etc.) (5.3%), Low vitality of chicks (3.4%), Selecting poor eggs (3.4%).

Early hatching is of more importance, according to the comments of poultrymen, than the figures in the table indicate. It appears that relatively few flock owners are familiar with the advantages of early hatching, but those who do their hatching early find it a distinct benefit.

men, than the figures in the table indicate. It appears that relatively few flock owners are familiar with the advantages of early hatching, but those who do their hatching early find it a distinct benefit. For instance, one farmer says, "Last year all of my chickens hatched after the first of June were runts. Those before that were normal and were laying in October. The same care and feed were given to all of them." Another observes, "When I get my chicks hatched in April and May I do not have runts in my flock." Still another estimates that one-third of late hatches are runty. "Hatch no chicks later than May 1," he says.

Of equal interest are the warnings against inbreeding. "We have no runts in our poultry" is the statement of a Virginia farmer, who adds, "We buy purebred cocks from a different strain every year." "Keep purebred fowls and change the sire every year" is the injunction of another poultryman, and his experience is typical of many others. Farmers' experiences with early hatching tally with the results of experiments by the bureau of animal industry of the United States Department of Agriculture. In these experiments the early hatched chicks showed a marked superiority over those purposely hatched late. There was a noticeably steady degradation in size and type of the late chicks compared with those hatched early.

From these side lights it is easily seen that the questions of runtiness and good live-stock management are closely related and are tied up with economic factors of great importance.

The attraction of Harold Lloyd in a "Sailor Made Man" drew a good house at the movie last night. The picture is a "scream" from start to finish. The same picture will be shown this evening again.
