CERTIFYING OF POTATOES SOUGHT BY MANY GROWERS

Interest in Crop for Seed Shown all Over Oregon, Prof. Hyslop Finds on Trip.

More potato fields are entered for certification than ever before, according to G. R. Hyslop, chief in farm crops at Oregon Agricultural College, who has just returned from an extensive tour of potato districts throughout Oregon. Some of the fields were turned down because of too much disease or weak plants. Some of those fields failing to pass are from poor seed sorted out of certified seed while others are from good certified seed but the buyer failed to pull out the diseased plants in time to prevent the spread of the disease this year.

"The large number of fields planted to the better seed is going to show in the increased yield per acre this year," says Professor Hyslop. "More fields with productive rather than diseased plants will make more saleable potatoes."

"There has been some misrepresentation of certified seed on the part of some anxious to sell their poor stock at the certified price. One lot growing this year from seed that was misrepresented had more than 50 per cent disease. To sell uncertified seed as certified or to sell certified seed without tags is a violation of the law and punishable by fine and imprisonment."

The destructive disease—blackleg—is unusually common this year. It causes a dwarfing of the plants and a yellowing of the leaves. The standard corrosive sublimate treatment has been found to be the most effective in controlling blackleg and is recommended for both certified seed fields and common seed fields. Small seed pieces are not so good as large ones. Whole seed is usually better than cut seed especially for early planting, believes Professor Hyslop. Eight inches deep in warm or cold soil is too deep and three inches deep in hot dry soil or in unirrigated sections is too shallow. Even with irrigation where the rows are ridged up four to five inches is better.
