Electrical Dust Storms

Dust storms, which charge barbed-wire fences to a high voltage, stall automobiles by interfering with their ignition systems and add new worries to radio listeners by causing even worse static than thunderstorms, are among the curious phenomena that visit sections of the great plains east of the Rockies in dry seasons, says Popular Mechanics Magazine. In northwestern Kansas, during one of these disturbances, a man became curious about the amount of electricity his aerial was collecting and connected it with the ground wire through a 32 candlepower light. He obtained as brilliant light as when it was connected with his automobile battery. No thunder or lightning occurs during these electrified dust storms, nor is there any known relation between them and earth magnetism. Any metallic object insulated from the earth seems to become highly electrified.
