FARM POINTERS

The strawberry root louse, a relatively new insect pest in Oregon, may be controlled by setting out uninfested plants, says the entomologist of the experiment station. When setting out strawberries it is advisable to dip the plants in a nicotine solution if aphids are present. This kills all the aphids that have hatched. The aphids winter as small, black, shiny eggs that are deposited on the under side of the leaves. The dipping is done in the spring or in the fall before the plants are set out.

Small white insects found on houseplants in Oregon are controlled by spraying, says the entomologist of the experiment station. These insects are known as green house flies. A spray of whaleoil soap 1 1-2 ounces and water one gallon, is satisfactory. This kills the insects by contact, so several applications at weekly intervals, are necessary.

Skim milk is often fed to bull calves for a longer period than heifers, says the Oregon experiment station. A bull calf may be carried on to eight or ten months of age, although he can be weaned earlier if fed good leguminous hay, or if he has the run of good pasture in addition to a grain mixture. As it is desirable to keep the bull growing, it may be necessary to feed grain for best results. A good mixture is five parts of bran, four of ground oats and one of linseed meal.

February is a time for poultrymen that are raising chicks to get brooding equipment ready. It is well to clean and disinfect the houses, assemble and set up the brooding equipment, and order the fuel supply. Also to see that the brooder stove is working properly and make necessary repairs or improvements to the brooder houses or equipment so as to have everything ready before the rush of other spring duties, says the Oregon experiment station.
