Hog Cholera. Hog cholera which means tremendous loss wherever allowed to run will never again be a problem in Oregon if growers and feeders use proper precautions. No purchases should be made from diseased herds and no uncooked pork products should be fed. Most outbreaks in this state are started from these sources or from water-borne infection. Vaccination is now practically 100 percent perfect and can always be used if there is danger from nearby infection, states Dr. W. H. Lytle, state veterinarian.

SPRAYING WEEDS WITH CHLORATES FOUND EFFECTIVE

With the effectiveness of chlorate sprays and dusts in controlling weeds practically established, Oregon farmers are now in a position to clean up fence rows and eradicate small patches of weeds that formerly made field cultivation for weed control a rather hopeless task, says E. R. Jackman, farm crops specialist of the Oregon State college Extension Service.

Interest in the use of these chemicals has increased rapidly throughout the state recently as a result of a campaign carried on during the past three years by county agents. More than 300,000 pounds of chemicals approximately one-third of which was sodium chlorate and the rest calcium chlorate were used in Oregon last year, Jackman reports. Observations made to date show sodium chlorate to be more effective than calcium chlorate, he says.

These chemicals are too expensive for use on a large scale, Jackman says, and the chief value of their discovery lies in the fact that farmers are now able to clean up small patches of weeds such as quack grass, Canada thistle, morning glory and others in their fields and along fence rows and roadsides, thus making it possible to clean cultivate fields without having them immediately re-infested from adjacent areas where cultivation is impossible.

Fall or late summer has been found the best time for application, and weeds seem to be killed more easily on land unplowed for several years. Much of the killing of the roots apparently does not take place until the spring following application. Spraying has been found more effective than dusting for summer use.

Egg Grading Profitable.

H. E. Botsford, market specialist at Cornell University, as a result of a recent survey on the effect of the New York egg grading law, states that a profitable increase in egg consumption can be accomplished by selling eggs on a definite grade basis.

The egg grading law of Oregon is a guarantee also of quality to consumer, more careful methods of handling and fairer prices for the standardized product.
