GAME CENSUS OF NATIONAL FORESTS

Big game animals in the national forests continue to increase in numbers, judging by reports recently summarized by the U. S. Forest Service. Over a million big game animals are estimated for the 151 national forests, this estimate being based largely on estimates by experienced forest officers and partly on actual count checked against data secured from state game officials, trappers, and others. The figures apply only to the national forests, and not to areas outside the federal forests. This year's increase is chiefly in deer, although elk also were reported to have increased appreciably in numbers. Very slight gains were shown for moose, mountain sheep, mountain goats, and antelope. The grizzly bear continues to decrease in numbers although increases in most localities are reported for black or brown bear.

One of the American game animals once supposed to have practically disappeared is the antelope. On the national forests these animals have shown a 45 per cent gain since 1927 and are now believed to number in excess of 11,000. The latest estimates show deer present in everyone of the 151 national forests. The number of deer increased, according to the estimates during the past year, from 802,450 to 877,780. Despite the many thousands of deer bagged by hunters, most of the western forests show substantial gains in the deer population. The forests of Oregon are estimated to have over 80,000; Washington in excess of 26,000 and the two northwestern states well over 100,000 deer. The national forests in Washington show an increase of 500 mountain goats and there are still a few mountain sheep left.
