Physical features and technical details of the plan for the Umatilla rapids project were outlined to the committee by George C. Baer, executive secretary of the association, who quoted the engineering report of the reclamation service to the effect that a 57-foot dam at the rapids would produce 420,000 primary horsepower and would water 90,000 acres of land. Half of the irrigated district would lie in Oregon and half in Washington.

Under the setup worked out by the engineers, power could be produced for 1.2 mills a kilowatt hour and could be sold at the dam for 2 mills a kilowatt hour, or about half the present cost of the major portion of the electrical power now being produced in Washington and Oregon. Mr. Baer said. The plan provides for the complete amortization of the cost of the project in 42 years. The cost is estimated at $45,000,000.

The electrical energy could be delivered economically within a 250-mile radius, extending as far east as Boise, Idaho, and covering most of Oregon and Washington. Mr. Baer told the committee. As in the case of Boulder dam, it would be proposed that signed contracts for the power would be placed in the hands of the secretary of the interior before construction was started. Mr. Baer indicated that preliminary surveys gave promise that the power could be marketed successfully.—The Oregonian.

Me and President Hoover are going to have a conference next week on how to help sell more lumber — prices are low — some 'thin' awful how low — carpenters are hungry too! Doggone the luck — wish somebody would grab off some of our lowest priced building material in years.
