The following article was taken from world disarmament notes and seems to us worth passing on.

"Millions of veterans," writes Correspondent Herbert Corey, "would find relief in another war. The wife would get the monthly pay, there would be pension to look forward to as well as insurance adjustments, and there would be one more good time with the old gang."

Well, perhaps Mr. Corey is right. But if millions of our veterans feel that way about it, they have exactly the same sort of intelligence that would accept a small boy to set fire to the schoolhouse and burn up teacher and pupils so that he might gain respite from his lessons.

Mr. Corey assumes, in this article at least, that the next war will be exactly like the last, and that belligerent Americans would merely embark, shouting, for foreign shores while our business men stayed at home and raked in the money.

He forgets presumably that democracy has already been saved once. He speaks of our prosperity during those days, but evidently fails entirely to consider the state of the Belgian refugee and the French peasant who, at the same time, were placed in a somewhat less enticing situation.

Wouldn't it be fine and quite worthy of reckless materialism, to have another nice bloody war, but to have it, of course, on the other side of the world so that we might reap the benefits of prosperity while other nations had home swept away, civilization slaughtered and starved and fields made barren?

But suppose that this time the enemies came over here and dropped bombs on our great skyscrapers, riddled our beautiful churches with cannon balls, gassed our children, ruined our crops and laid waste our lovely land. That would be quite another side of the picture for the veterans to consider, would it not, and no such lovely picnic for us, as a good many people seem to consider the last conflict.

To talk of war bringing back prosperity is like discussing the wisdom of destroying a fine income-producing property to get the insurance money.
