WATER RIGHT IS REAL SAFEGUARD FOR LANDOWNERS.

Much has been said and written of late concerning the value of supplemental irrigation in Oregon, particularly in the western part of the state where this practice has but recently been widely accepted, but little has been said of the importance of early filling on irrigation water rights where a stream is the source of supply.

Arthur King, soils specialist of the state college extension service, has explained recently the provisions of the Oregon law regarding water rights. No one is subject to fine, of course, for taking water out of a stream before first filling on a right, he explains, but in case of shortage the man with a water right can stop the man without one from using any irrigation water from the stream even though it runs right through his place.

"If you are figuring on using water continuously for a period of years, it is safest to file for a water right so that you will be in a position to do the objecting in case of water shortage," says King. "Your water right will be dated and filed in the state engineer's office and your right will be prior to any of those filed on later dates."

That many western Oregon land owners have recently realized the future value of such rights is evidenced by the enormous increase in applications since the possibilities of irrigation in western Oregon have become generally known.

"The procedure in obtaining a water right is to get an application blank from the state engineer's office," says King. "A book of instructions will come with it. The following facts are needed to fill out the blank:

"The legal location of the land to be irrigated, down to the nearest forty; a map to show the location of the land within the different tracts; a legal description of the points of diversion, whether by pump or dam; and a map showing the location of the main canal for diverting the water. The county agent has a supply of these blanks and is prepared to assist in filling them out. Once acquired the right lasts forever unless the owner fails to use the water for five years, in which case it may be applied for by someone else."

LOST SQUADRON HAS FEATURES TO PLEASE ALL.

A new kind of air picture is "The Lost Squadron," which will be at the Oasis theatre Thursday, Friday and Saturday. Seen in preview yesterday, it was found to have all the elements of grand entertainment. First of all, it has thrills of the breath-taking sort with airplanes roaring out of the sky to dive into the sea or crash into buildings and burst into flames among flying debris. The thrills alone would make "The Lost Squadron" a notable picture.

What makes it a new kind of air picture, however, is the fact that the thrills are all part of a close-knit and fast-moving story with no weak links or gaps in plausibility. It has boisterous humor that brought chuckles from the preview audience which will swell into roars of laughter when the house is full. It has moments of tender pathos, too, and one gripping, dramatic situation after another and suspense that tightens nearly to the breaking point.

The cast has been chosen with fine discrimination for roles that bring out the best work of each player. Richard Dix heads the list as a self-sacrificing virile hero, a good loser in love and life. His buddies are Joel McCrea, Robert Armstrong and Hugh Herbert, three such friends as any man would be proud to have, and such as every man who was in the war remembers. Feminine honors are shared by Mary Astor as a faithful ex-sweetheart of the hero and Dorothy Jordan as "the pest," sister of one of the three airmen and loved by the other two. Erich von Stroheim is seen in a masterful piece of villainy as a picture director who is willing to send a mere stunt flier to certain death in a defective ship for the sake of a spectacle.

The story is by Dick Grace, dean of the Hollywood stunt fliers, and the loops, spins and crashes that make up the thrills are credited to Grace, are Gobel, Leo Nomis and Frank Clark.

The story opens in the air with American and German airmen shooting it out with machine guns above the clouds on the morning of armistice day. Returning home to find their sweethearts and their old jobs gone, the captain, two lieutenants and a sergeant-mechanic drift to Hollywood and become stunt fliers, finding in this occupation the money and the excitement they need. From there on the plot unrolls like the rush of a plane in a power dive.

The odd thing about "The Lost Squadron" is that this picture itself is just what it seems to condemn—a thriller filmed at the risk of men's lives, to make a cinematic Roman holiday. How they could have done the things they did in this picture without killing off a few fliers passes the understanding of this reviewer. Anyhow, it's a grand picture.

DISEASE CAUSE OF STRAWBERRY WILT.

Have you ever noticed strawberry plants wilt down wholly or in part right in the midst of a season, and if no apparent cause?

If the plants were Marshall or Clark's Seedling varieties the probability is that the trouble was caused by a disease, as yet unnamed, but which results from the same fungus that causes the rhizoctonia disease in potatoes.

This is the conclusion drawn from a report just made by Dr. S. M. Zeller, plant pathologist at the Oregon State college experiment station, in which he tells of his investigations of this disease. The report is contained in a new station bulletin 295 entitled, "A Strawberry Disease Caused by Rhizoctonia." The report covers studies made by the station on this disease since 1928.

The outstanding leaf symptoms of this disease are first a wilting under certain conditions, and second, a purpling of the veins. Very slight infections may persist for two or three years with merely a dwarfing effect on the plants but in many instances the plants will severely. Dark lesions on the roots are other characteristic symptoms.

Dr. Zeller's investigations show that varieties vary greatly in susceptibility to this disease with Marshall showing the greatest likelihood to infection with Clark's Seedling next. The new Corvallis berry appears fairly susceptible but has not been studied closely under field conditions. On the other hand, Ettersburg 121, the present commercial canning sort, is almost, if not entirely immune.

Control of the disease is complicated by the fact that the fungus of rhizoctonia is carried not only by potatoes but by some weeds as well, including the common broken fern. It remains in the ground for considerable time, moreover, so that it is not safe to plant strawberries on land that has grown either potatoes, strawberries or broken fern within the previous year or two, says Dr. Zeller. Selection of clean plants planted on clean ground, together with some attention to resistant varieties constitute the only control methods yet found to be practical.
