GAS IS GREAT FARM AID; RIPENS GREEN TOMATOES.

Science seems determined to make modern farming just one gas attack after another. The up-to-date grower gasses his prune trees to kill root borers, puts a different gas down a gopher hole to kill the pests, and now he can turn still another gas on his green tomatoes to speed up their ripening.

Ethylene gas is the material used in this way and it may now be purchased commercially in various sized drums. It is not recommended for use by the ordinary farm gardener with but a few surplus tomatoes, but for the large market gardeners the process is proving practical and economical, according to Professor Bouquet.

"Under ethylene gas treatment tomatoes take on a bright red color in from four to six days, depending on the state of maturity when treated," the circular states. "Fruits treated in this way are said to have a better flavor and decreased acidity in comparison with those ripened on the vines or ripening naturally after being picked in a green condition."

The tomatoes may be ripened in this way in standard crates for the gas readily penetrates the average style of container. The method is believed useful in treating tomatoes picked in a green state just after first light fall frosts. The circular may be had free.
