

Home for Orphan.
Thursday and Saturday "Little Orphan Annie" has a new home, the Oasis theatre. They call her "The girl with ten million homes," and still she's an orphan. Her ten million homes constitute those where she has become a daily visitor to the whole family through comic strips and the radio. Everyone will enjoy seeing her on the screen. Laugh and cry with her.

The cast includes Mitz Green, the sweetheart of "Skippy" and "Huckleberry Finn," Edna May Oliver, Matt Moore and others.
On this same bill there is an excellent comedy and a Micky Mouse cartoon.

Who Killed Jenny Wren?
The solution of the great air mystery, "The Phantom of Crestwood," will be shown at the Oasis theatre

Sunday and Monday. Many of you probably heard the NBC broadcast of the first six episodes of this thriller and tried to figure out who was guilty of the murder of Jenny Wren. Now you will be able to see how good you are as an amateur detective.

In the air drama the figure of suspicion was deftly pointed at first one and then another of the men and women present at the country estate. "Crestwood," when Jenny Wren, bent on an extortion scheme of huge proportions, was murdered, the usual mystery drama, were introduced. No super-man-hunters, gum-chewing detectives or clever newspaper columnist appeared to solve the problem. Instead, an underworld character assumes a "Raffles" role and sets out to find the guilty person—a measure inspired by his own desire to save himself from the police.

The plot unfolds with increasing suspense, building to a climax that is said to be sensational and startling.

Ricardo Cortez, Karen Morley, Pauline Fredrick, George E. Stone, Richard (Skeets) Gallagher, Robert McWade, Anita Louise, H. B. Warner and several other prominent screen players are in the cast.

In addition to this feature there is a comedy with plenty of laughs and a Fox Movietone news in which President Hoover is shown speaking at Detroit, and Franklin Roosevelt at Pittsburgh.

or stone. Parsnips are the hardest of the roots and may be dug as needed. In contrast to the carrot, the sugar content of parsnips increases after cold weather and during storage.

Cabbage.
Well-matured solid cabbage will keep well in a cool cellar on a shelf laid preferably not more than two layers deep. Cabbage keeps best at about 32 to 40 degrees F., but is not injured by slight freezing. In the field the heads can be protected from mild frosts by putting a few of the large thick outer leaves over the apex of the heads before night. Solid heads of cabbage may be stored in a pit such as described for beets. The plants are pulled, roots and all, and placed in a pit with the heads down, being covered sufficiently to protect them from freezing.

Celery.
Protection of this vegetable from cold weather can be obtained by having the plants banked with boards, soil or both. Celery will freeze at a temperature of about 28 or 29 degrees F. If one has a frost-proof cellar or outhouse, plants not yet fully grown nor blanched may be dug up with the roots on and placed in moist sand or soil. Water at intervals to keep the plants rooted and also provide proper aeration. Some home gardeners store their celery in a protected coldframe. Plants in the boards subject to freezing temperatures may be protected further by using gunny-sacking at night, removing the material in the daytime. Commercial celery keeps well in crates in cold storage with temperatures approximately 31 1/2 or 32 degrees F.

Eggplant.
Eggplant can be kept for several weeks after freezing temperatures by cutting the fruits from the plants and placing in boxes with a lining of dry sawdust. Particular care must be taken to keep the eggplant from being bruised before storage. Old sacks covering the plants and fruit in the field during light frosty weather will lengthen harvest for several weeks.

Onions.
Previous to putting onions in storage, the bulbs are pulled in the field and laid in windrows for cutting, three rows of onions usually comprising a windrow. The onions lie in the rows for two and a half to three weeks, depending on the weather, at the end of which time they should be dry and well enough cured to be brought into the storage house. Onions are stored on racks usually piled from 8 to 12 inches deep, having their tops on when in storage. The average freezing point of onions is about 30 degrees F., so that a temperature of 36 to 45 degrees F. is best. It is necessary to have circulation of air so that there may be a comparatively low percentage of humidity. Onions should not be handled in storage while frozen. Poorly shaped onions of a poor keeping strain will usually have a short period of dormancy and will sprout readily. Well-shaped onions of long keeping strains may have a dormancy period of several months.

Peppers.
Green or red peppers may be stored for several weeks without much shrinkage, provided the temperature is not above 50 or 55 degrees F. and the relative humidity is about 85 to 90 per cent. The thick-meat peppers, unblemished by bruises, are best for storage. Cover plants and fruits in field as suggested for eggplant.

Potatoes.
The best storage temperature for table or seed potatoes is one high enough, for the first two weeks at least, to permit suberization of wound injuries, preferably 50 to 60 degrees F. After this, the tubers are best kept at about 40 or 45 degrees F. Light should be excluded, and while a fairly high degree of humidity is desirable there should be an ample supply of aeration. Types of potato storage include outside pitting, dugouts, or cellars as well as insulated structures.

Pumpkins and squash.
There is often considerable decay of these two vegetables in storage. Decay may be largely prevented if the specimens are fully matured in the field, are carefully handled when being harvested and brought in to the storage place, and are not subjected to low temperatures and high humidity when stored. Skin bruises must be avoided if the squash are to keep for any length of time. After the squash have been out from the vines in the field, they may be left in groups but not piled for two weeks or so if the weather is favorable, being protected by the squash vines should frosts occur. The fruits should be stored one deep on racks or shelves in a dry, well-ventilated storeroom where the humidity is relatively low and the temperature is between 50 and 60 degrees F. A slightly higher temperature may be maintained during the early part of the storage. Warm attic temperatures will probably prevent decay but there will be considerable shrinkage. On the other hand, a cool, moist storage place induces mold, especially if there has not been much care used in preventing exterior abrasions or bruises.

It provides for review of all local tax budgets by a local, non-salaried board of citizens and taxpayers; it will insure safe and sane regulation of public expenditures, without abrogating the principle of home rule; it will not disturb the six per cent. tax limitation nor any debt restriction now fixed by constitutional provision, but will establish more effective tax and debt control than these so-called limitations have actually provided.

Information On Vegetable Storage

Beets, Carrots, Parsnips, Salsify, Turnips.

In Western Oregon roots are best stored by leaving them in the ground with the tops cut off an inch or two above the apex of the roots, putting sufficient earth over the rows to keep them from being injured by cold weather. If the roots are dug to be stored in the cellar, they must be placed in moist earth or sand—otherwise there is considerable shrinkage. Outdoor pits are often used for root crops. To construct such a pit choose a well-drained location, digging a trench 6 or 8 inches deep and of suitable size to hold the amount of roots to be stored. Line with straw and fill with the roots, heaping them into a cone-shaped pile. Cover with the same material used to line the pit, then add earth to a depth of two or three inches or more, according to the severity of the weather. Ventilation may be secured in small pits by extending the straw covering of the vegetables through the earth covering, or a hollow-tile pipe or flue of rough boards may extend up through the pile of vegetables. Cap any ventilation holes with a board
