BUSY BEES FOUND TO WORK BEST IN ALFALFA REGIONS.

Consider the bee—traditionally known for his—or rather, her—industry and freedom from unemployment.

That is just what some farm management and entomology specialists at the Oregon State college experiment station have been doing this past year—considering the bee and the methods under which it has been kept in Oregon. The result is the current publication of the first progress report on cost of honey production in Oregon, a mimeographed circular of 13 pages containing figures and conclusions drawn from 1931 operations in this state.

Oregon is not a leading honey producing state, but does have a substantial honey industry, points out A. S. Burrier, associate economist, who was in charge of the survey. He was assisted by Frank E. Todd, federal apiculturist, and H. A. Cullen, associate professor of entomology. For the four years 1928-31 the total colonies in the state averaged 64,375, producing a yearly volume of honey valued at $200,000.

As little information on honey production costs has heretofore been available, the Oregon State Beekeepers' association strongly urged this two-year cost survey which is being financed under the federal Purnell fund.

Just as in dairy cost studies, the eastern Oregon alfalfa regions lead in low cost of production of honey, the first report shows. The alfalfa-clover region leads in number of commercial producers, incidentally, accounting for 53 per cent of the state total and extending over eastern and parts of southern Oregon.

In those regions the net production cost averaged 6.2 cents a pound for extracted honey. In the fireweed section of the northwest coast counties the net cost was 6.9 cents a pound, while in the mixed-blossom section of the Willamette valley costs were 7.8 cents. The state average for 85 apiarists—modern for beekeepers—operating 16,348 colonies and producing just short of a million pounds of honey, was 6.4 cents a pound.

Individual costs varied from an extreme low of 2.7 cents a pound to 41 cents. Yield, as with most farm enterprises, was found a vital factor in cost, though high yield obtained by expensive means was of no avail in keeping costs down. Figures are now being gathered on the 1932 crop.

LAMB CREEP EASILY MADE SAYS O. S. C. SPECIALIST.

A lamb creep to be used in supplying young lambs with extra grain to hasten their development may be easily and quickly made with four movable panels commonly found on any farm raising sheep, says Orin M. Nelson, associate professor of animal husbandry at Oregon State college.

One panel is made over into a creep panel by nailing on vertical slats spaced about eight to 10 inches apart. Rounding the edges prevents tearing the wool of the lambs. A creep made of three ordinary 12-foot panels and one creep panel will give an enclosure large enough for 50 lambs as all will not be in the creep at the same time. It is best placed near a shed or in the field wherever the flock ordinarily congregates during the day.

WITH FARMERS AROUND THE STATE

OREGON CITY—Assistance in planning low cost lunches or dinners is one of the services given by the home economics extension service either from the central office at Corvallis or from the various county home demonstration agent offices. The Warner Grange committee of Clackamas county was assisted in planning such a lunch for the joint meetings of the home economics and agricultural committees recently. The lunch decided upon included Spanish wheat, parsnips and apple casserole, sandwiches, custard, cookies, coffee and milk. Each of the 21 granges were asked to bring certain dishes included in the menu.

CORVALLIS—With a return to some of the practices and interests of grandmother's day, Oregon homemakers are again piecing patchwork patterns and quilting them. To meet requests for help in duplicating old designs for piecing and quilting, Mrs. Azalea Sager, clothing specialist in the extension service, has written two mimeographs, HE 447 "Favorite patchwork patterns," and HE 448 "Simple quilting designs." Both leaflets are available from county extension offices or from the home economics extension service at Corvallis.
