Emergency Hay Crops Planted.

REDMOND—Spring-sown vetch and oats as an emergency hay crop in central Oregon has come into favor this year as a result of the most severe freezeout of alfalfa and other storage crops this section has experienced in many years. County Agent Hagglund has also recommended interplanting oats in some badly thinned alfalfa stands, and the production of more root crops for feed, including carrots and Bortfield turnips. The winter also damaged some new seedlings of red and bluish clover.
