COVER CROP TIME AT HAND; PRACTICE AID TO ORCHARDS.

To save plant food, add humus to the soil and prevent erosion in Oregon orchards, nothing equals the fall-sown cover crop, says O. T. McWhorter, horticultural specialist in the extension service at Oregon State college. With the early fall rains here already, such crops sown at once will come rapidly, he says.

"Continual cultivation of orchard soils liberates plant food which is soluble in water and which leaches away rapidly during the heavy plant food and returns it to the soil when the crop is plowed under in the spring.

"Many Oregon soils become seriously deficient in humus unless organic matter is constantly returned. Annual cover crops assist greatly in maintaining this humus supply so necessary for the continued good health and production of orchard trees.

"Recent years have emphasized the need of protecting the orchard against erosion. Nearly every orchardist has experienced or seen erosion where the surface soil was washed away in spots down to plow depth. Cover crops or their equivalent in straw or other bulky material are the best protection against this loss of surface soil. Even weeds are better than nothing for such protection."

In discussing the possible cover crops to use, McWhorter mentions a long list that have proved satisfactory under varying conditions. East of the mountains the crop must be either an annual winter hardy crop or a perennial crop such as is used in some of the irrigated orchards.

A relatively new idea in some parts of western Oregon is the use of turnips. Sown in the fall, white globe turnips make a heavy growth that has proved satisfactory for use at least part of the time. They are sown at the rate of 1 1/2 pounds of seed per acre, broadcast and harrowed or drilled in.

Other possibilities are winter grain, common or Hungarian vetch, Austrian peas, mustard, rye, or various combinations of these.

When police summoned by neighbors of Clarence Gaver of St. Louis found Nelson Dannewitz asleep in the Gaver home, Dannewitz told them that he robbed the house, became sleepy, and went to bed.
