The Business of Living.

Glen S. "Pop" Warner, brother of W. J. Warner of this city, who has been head coach at Stanford University for years, and is now director of coaching at Temple University, Philadelphia, Pa., has written an article entitled "Football's New Deal" which appeared in last week's issue of the Saturday Evening Post. It deals with inflation in football. He says that "the time has come to deflate football down to normal."

the team is playing. The "big gate" is in the foreground.

The "big gate" attitude may be applied to almost every walk of life. During the past few years, even in pre-war days, the idea of real living was centered around big wages and extended credit with the hope that prices would continue to rise and that the creditor would continue to extend time. We all know the story as it goes after the crash in 1929. Money not only dominated athletics but every activity in the business world.

Mr. Warner says "the only way to stop the hiring of athletes is by eliminating the reason for hiring them." Sports for sports sake, or living for the love of living, consequently, go hand in hand. From childhood the average citizen, both men and women, are taught to educate themselves for the position that will bring the most financial returns—It is taught of the real game of living. So in football, unless the game is played for sports sake, the big financial returns dominate all other angles.

Many codes have been written by which we may form our lives.—We will not now attempt in the most meager way to recommend any phase of a code, but life teaches self-control, understanding, and a will to meet conditions as they arise whether there is money in it or merely another chance to plug away at the business of living.
